THE FUTURE OF COTTON.

The New York Commercial and Financial ('bronicle has this to say on the future supply of the great staple. Let planters take heed in time;

There appears to be a disappointment among some that prices have not improved more on the full of Paris. This is due to two facts-first, that the effect of such an event is always in very great part anticipated and discounted; and second, the continued very large receipts are accessarily weighing down the With our own crop reaching over 3.700,000 bales, we certainly do not secuny fair prospect of getting prices up permanently.
