The goat was coeval with the ox and the sheep, in those regions of the East where civilization first dawned upon mankind He was a part in the mythological systems of the amination of the whole subject. first nations. In the Sacred Scriptures he is his meat was allowed to be used as human food, and he is ordained to be employed in remarkable religious ceremonies. Thou shalt make curtains of goats' hair as a covering to the tabernacle," is a sacred injunction. The earliest Greeian and Roman writers speak of him as yielding food and raiment, and super-stition connected him with the attributes and services of the gods. He has been the universal companion of mankind in their that no goats were found in New Holland, or $580 to $2,500. in the Polynesian Islands, and more strange still, no traces of the domesticated goat were found on this continent, though at its discovery it was peopled throughout. There was, however, the wild Rocky Mountain goat, which, if it could be domesticated, it is supposed might possess some valuable properties. The fleece of the goat has furnished man with, his, richest, most durable and gorgeous attire; his nutritious and wholesome milk and meat have yielded him food; his skin has supplied the unterials for water sacks to bottles, morocco, &c., while the animal itself may be said to have lived on chips. And yet among us the goat is the subject of an unnatural and unreasonable prejudice.

their valuable milking properties.

HaMr. I. S. Diehl, our former Consul Jat Batavia, says: "the goat is an indiscriminate feeder, living on weeds, browse, do., where a slicep would starve. Its milk is much used by travelers and families, and especially by inhabitants of tropical, bilious and fever countries, or a preventive and cure for those and other diseases incident to such countries. The medicinal qualities of goats' milk have long been known and acknowledged in the old world, and in some portions of this country, it heing not only very wholesome, but less liable its surdle on the stomach. By those who have tested the different kinds of milk, it is much esteemed and preferred for tea and coffee, and is largely used for children and consumptives and invalids, especially at the various hospitals.

Mr. James B. Davis, of South Carolina, who has traveled much in the East, says: "The Malta milking goat gives about a gallon of milk per day. It may not be uninteresting for me to state a fact observed by me in the malarious sections of the United States and ITS CAUSES, CHARACTER, CONDUCT Mexico. In all similar sections in Asia and the East, they regard cows milk as being an exciting cause to billious fevers as well as to liver complaint; and hence use only goats' milk (1 The tinodus agendi" has been under discussion by the faculty of Paris."

Persons even in large towns could, by the Persons eyen in large towns could, by the means of a goat, readily supply themselves with milk far superior to that which they commonly obtain, and it is surprising that a method so simple and cheap of avoiding the frauds too much practiced in this kind of food should be neglected."

Mr. G. S. Goe, of Brownville, Penn., had an Assyrian goat which gave a gallon of milk per day. Mr. Dichi bada similar coatequality good, whose milk he sold to physicians for their patients, for twenty conts a quart.

The kid should be taken off when about three weeks old. The goat should then yield about three quarts a day till about three months before parturition, when the quantity may be gradually reduced.

A goat should always be milked three times a day. This is better for the health of the gont, and improves the quality and quantity of the milk, It is not goverally known that a goat will give more milk tethered to a certain spot and moved now and then, than when she is permitted to run at large, If mischieveous they can be yoked and fottered. The wool bearing goat is justnew a subject of great interest to our manufacturers, for the time is not distant when fine and rich worsted stuffs will be made in the country from its wool, rivalling the gorgoous, durable and brilliant fauries of the farfamed Cashmere. We are already making worsted stuffs and lustrous Orleans goods; and all that is now wanted are the looms and skillful workmen. These to begin with can be imported. Descriptions and representations of the Indian Cashmere looms, and the Persian-shawl looms, etc., are now in possession of our agricultural department, sent home from the Paris Exposition by an intelligent gentleman, familiar with Eastern manufacturors, now traveling throughout Europe and some parts of Asia,

There are in the United States, from constantly referred to as forming the wealth of 3,000 to 4,000 of these wool-bearing goats of patriarchal families. By the laws of Moses the best known breeds. In this country these animals are improved in size, weight and quality of the fleece. The three-fourths blood yield a fleece softer and finer than the imported animal, but not so long. This is more than England can boast of. France has been more successful, but not as tuccessful as our breeders in the acclimation of this goat. 300 A
