So as "we travel further from the west, and shades of the prison house begin to close" around us, how we welcome the guide-book of history that tells us that others have traveled the same road and been exposed to the same accidents, and their good and their ill success is equally instructive. What a wonderful book it is; beginning with the life of civilized man, it will end only with that life.

Let us take a retrospective glance to when the first pages were written. The earth, having by the silent work of sages been completed for his habitation, long expected man appears to take possession, by the divine right of mind over matter, of his heritage, and with him the record begins. The book is fair to see with its fresh, uncut leaves, but as yet only a blank. But soon page after page is filled with the though is and actions of the sons of men, and we could almost weep to see how the snow-white pages are stained with injustice, fraud, gruelty and violence; the favored few oppressing the toiling many, might making right, until we could almost believe that God had forsaken his creation, and that men were made, as the wild until we could almost believe that God had forsaken his creation, and that men were made, as the wild beasts, to prey upon one another. But when the record grows blackest some deed of unselfish heroism gleams through the darkness and we read on, and as these examples, under the humanizing influences of civilization and Christianity, multiply, we take courses believing that.

"God's in His heaven All's right with the world," as we merge from the dawn into the fulle we become hopeful for the race and can believ are fiving now when the truth of the being more and more made the rule of action, may hope that the time, if it has not already, will soon come

"When the war drum will throb no longer, and the battle flags be furled
In the parliament of man, the federation of the world."

How much more favored are we who now read and study the book of history than they who lived during the making of the first chapters. If, as is often asserted, we are intellectually weaker than our forefathers, yet we can see further, as the pigmy on the glant's shoulders had a wider horizon than the giant himself, and how much more varied is the view; for now it is as wide as the globe. Well may history's muse make the proud assertion:

"I am the owner of the sphere, Of the seven stars and the solar year of Cessar's hand and Plage."

"I am the owner of the sphere, Of Cessar's hand and Plage."

"I am the owner of the sphere, Of Cessar's hand and Plage."

We teachers, then, to whom is entrusted the work teaching history, have a pleasant, if responsible, sk to perform, and should carefully study the best thods of discharging it. of teaching history, have a pleasant, if responsible, task to perform, and should carefully study the best methods of discharging it.

I think we should first try to awaken in the child-mind a wide-awake spirit of personal interest in what he is studying. Make him realize that he has an invidual interest in history; that men have labored, thought, studied, fought and died that he might live under the bright conditions of the present. Make him feet that the things, places and people that he is studying about are real. Make them stand out from the musty pages of the past as living creations, not as phantoms about which they study in order to know their lessons and toget a good mark, and which are then to be shut up again in the text book and forgotten about. In order to accomplish this result, you must be yourself the most animated and interested of all in questioning and teaching, and soon pupils will become so in studying and reciting. Life begets life. Show them how the history of the past affects the present; for instance, if you have a lesson on the Phoenicians, let them see how as traders and colonizers they advanced civilizations and liberty, "building better than they knew;" how much of the sciences and mechanical arts we owe to the Egyptains and Chaldeans; that to the Jews wasentrusted the keeping alive of the pure, undefiled religion; that the Greeks first gave the world an example of a government "of the people, by the people, for the people," Do not fall into a common mistake of teaching history as a record of wars only. Some historians are so dazzled by "battle's magnificently stern array" that, as Matthew Henry has said, "The Muse of History dazzled by "battle's magnificently stern array" that, as Matthew Henry has said, "The Muse of History has been so much in love with Mars that she has seldom conversed with Minerva."

Even in the early ages men were as much influenced by thinkers as by conquerors. Pericles, Socrates and Aristotle contributed as greatly to the glory of Greece as did Mittades, Leonidas and Alexander. Rome honors the names of Virgil, Horace and Cleero more than the dees those of her emperors. Luther, the poor monk, wielded greater power than did Charles V, the mightlest monarch in an age of absolutism. In our own time, the statesman is co-equal with, if he does not outrank, the general, in the councils of the nations.

mightiest monarch in an age of absolutism. In our own time, the statesman is co-equal with, if he does not outrank, the general, in the councils of the nations.

Not that I would undervalue, for an instant, military skill and achievements, for there are Gordian knots which can be cut only by the sword; but it is the head that should direct the use of this right arm of a country. One of the greatest aids in teaching history is a good text book. Now I think there are a great many teachers who profess to be able to be above the need of such an article; some; indeed, prefer to dispense with it altogether.

I freely grant that a teacher should be so familiar with the subject matter of the recitation as to be able to conduct it without the book, and that a teacher whose eye has to follow the written text continually to know if the pupil is reciting correctly, does not deserve the name of teacher, and had better vacate in favor of the well-prepared pupil. But I do claim that a scholar who has given his life to study, and devoted years to the preparation of a text book on a particular study, is a better guide than one's unaided and often disconnected ideas; for system is indespensible in any study. But a teacher can and should vary as often as possible the routine of daily recitation. I speak feelingly on this subject. For several years I had been obliged to teach Swinton's United States History—"a skeleton of facts"—as a bright boy called it; abook after Mr. Gradgrind's own heart. In vain I tried to revivify the dead bones. I would bring to the lesson my brighest manner, read and relate everything interesting I could find. All in vain. The subject matter of the book was perfectly correct, but stated in the dryest, baldest way, with nothing to appeal to the imagination and with but very few maps and illustrations. The children would not study it. They declared that United States history was the stupidest, most uninteresting in the world.

During the past two years I have taught Eggleston's. The style is clear, bright a whom I have taught are singular, but during the past two years I have had but one pupil who did not delight in going to the board.

I question them closely to see if they thoroughly understand the geographical features. They learn that a country with fine harbors will have a bold, adventurous, commercial population who become colonizers and civilizers; that a country intersected by mountains, by which the people are divided into distinct communities, favors the development of independent government; that plains, on account of their fertility, were the first centers of civilization; that England to-day owes her power to her insular position. Them nearly every hand in the class being lifted, some one is sent to the board to write the topics—different members of the class giving them—also watching and criticising the spelling and punctuation. Then the class recite from the topics, and some of them do so remarkably well. This gives them confidence in themselves, develops the memory and the reasoning powers, and gives them a good command of language. If anything is omitted, I call on some other pupil to give the missing link. I encourage them to always recite in their own words—for if they are able to do so, then I know they have mastered the subject. But if there are pupils who have no command of language (and there are some). I allow them to memorize the words of the text book, and as they improve, they gradually learn to express themselves in words of their own choosing. Of course, their language is not always the most choice: neither is their grammar all that might be desired, but these faults I try quietly to correct. The way in which they sometimes describe the stately Greeks and Romans would freeze the blood of Cierro with horror, but I believe Socrates would recognize the truth and vigor of Young America, and trust to time and further teaching to apply the polish. This method also encourages originality instead of confining all to the dead level of the text book. Then, too, with this method, even a pupil who

I have a pupil who had learned in a former text-book that Magellan was the first man to sail around the world. His Eggleston's taught him that Magellen himself was killed in an engagement on the Philipine islands, but his ships continued the voyage and accomplished the famous feat. On examination he was asked to tell all he knew about Magellan, and gave the following answer: "Magellan was the first man who sailed around the world, and he didn't do it, for he was killed on the way."

This section was refreshed by good rains Sunday night and Monday evening.

The farmers all unite in saying that they have good stands of corn and that it is looking better than usual this year. Mr. Robt. Strait, one of our energetic young farmers, who does not believe in having his corn crib in Cincinnati, has twenty acres of corn, well worked out, that will now average knee high. Moultrie Bratton says that the reason the stand of corn was so good is because the ground got so hard directly after it was planted, that the crows could not pull it up. This was certainly hard on the crows.

Some of the farmers who were in a hurry to plough up their cotton and plant over, are now regretting it, as in most places where it has been left there is now a good stand. But in some places the seed had rotted in the ground. I witnessed this on a piece on the plantation of Hon.

M. C. PARROTT. W. N. Elder. Out of a dozen rows that he ploughed up in my presence, after examining carefully, we found but two that had sufficient seed sprouting to make a stand. In the other rows we found the seed rotten.

The strawberry crop is most abundant this year. The old fields around here are literally red with them. The May cherries are almost done. As a usual thing the birds got most of them. June cherries are turning; the crop is abundant. From present indications the crop of peaches, apples and blackberries will be equally as good as it was in '89.

itors to the old Church Yard! No marks on the fallen down headboard to answer the question; the weeds and wild vines are fast hiding the little mound made years before. Is it possible that we are so soon to be forgotten, when it was with the greatest effort that we could allow our dear ones to be put in the cold earth that day? With bleeding hearts and tear bedimmed eyes we leave the graves, making resolutions that should be kept; resolutions that sounded sweet in our own ears and gave consolation and encouragement. Remember the dead. Keep the graves free from the weeds, and engrave the names of our loved ones on tablets of stone.
