A Meek Attorney's Plea.

W. B. Moore, of Somerset, was a man possessed of rare good sense, and was one of the wittiest lawyers who LESSON X, FIRST QUARTER, INTERever appeared before the Kentucky bar. Judge Bramlette was a very high-tempered man and unusually severe on lawyers whom he did not like. Colonel Sherrod Williams, who was practicing law at Somerset, had at one time practiced in Louisville, and was much in the habit, when arguing [Copyright, 1902, by American Press Association.] a case before Judge Bramlette, of referring to some case as having been decided by the Louisville chancery court. This always riled the judge, and caused him to frequently remark that he was not bound by the decision of that judge.
