CHAPTER XVII.

Probably nothing ever gave rise to more comment in Radville than Betty Graham's departure to spend the winter at a boarding school near Philadelphia. Hardly any one knew anything about it—fact, the rumor of it was just being noised about and contemptuously discredited on all hands—when Tracey galloped down Main street Monday morning with the news that she had left on the early train.

Radville was at first stupefied, then clamorous, but there was little information to be got out of old Sam. Duncan himself refused to be interviewed. He told everybody who had the impudence to mention the matter to him that it was Mr. Graham's affair. Mr. Graham was a substantial business man, he said, and if he chose to send his daughter away to school he had a perfect right to do so.

One direct result of it all was to hasten Josie's own leave taking. It would never do to let the Grahams eclipse the Lockwoods, you see. Josie had been talking of going to a school

"Well?"
"Are you stuck on Angie, Mr. Duncan?" demanded Tracey desperately. "Great snakes! I hope not!"
The boy sighed. "Thank you, Mr. Duncan. I was only worried because you and Angie is singin' together in the choir now Josie Lockwood's gone to school—an—an—Angie's the purtiest girl in town—an I was 'fraid 't you might like her best when Josie's away. An' I wanted to ask you to pick out 'smother girl."
Duncan chuckled silently. "Tracey," he said presently, "it strikes me you must be in love with Angie."
"And I think she's rather partial to you."
"Do you, really, Mr. Duncan?"
"I do. Do you want to marry her?"
"Gee! I can't hardly wait! Only," Tracey continued, disconsolate, "it ain't no use, really. She's so purty an' swin' ol' old man Tutill's so rich—not like the Lockwoods, but rich all the same—an I'm only the son of the livery stable man an' fat—an—all that—an—"
"Nonsense, Tracey!" Nat interrupted firmly. "If you really want her and will follow the rules I give you it's a cinch."
"Honest, Mr. Duncan?"
"I guarantee it, Tracey. Listen to me," and Duncan expounded Kellogg's rules at length, adapting them to Tracey's circumstances, of course, and throughout maintained the gravity of a graven image. "You try and you'll see if I'm not right," he concluded.

with his enigmatic smile. "Well, because the rules don't require it." "What 'd you mean by that?" Tracey exploded.

Nat couldn't explain, so he countered neatly. "This is one of your Ange evenings, isn't it, Tracey?"

"Yep, but—"

"Well, you hurry along. I'll close up the shop."

To Duncan, now seated on the edge of an upturned box in a corner of the store, came an idea. He drew a roll of bills from his pocket and stripped off the top one.

"Here's $5," he said to Tracey. "Girls can usually be captured by judicious expenditures. I wish you luck."

"Ah, thanks, Mr. Duncan."

"But, Tracey—"

"The boy pounced at the door. "What?"

"Remember what I told you. Don't s'other girl."

USEFUL SNAKE STONE.

Charmer Who was Bitten by Cobra Got Rid of the Poison.

One Sunday morning two Indian snake-charmers came to my small bungalow at Hanwell," says a writer in a Cingalese newspaper. "They had three snakes with them and proceeded to make them dance as usual. I stopped them and asked them whether all that before, and asked them whether they could compel a wild snake to dance and, if so, whether they could catch one for the purpose. One of them expressed his willingness to do so. Ten days previously I had chased a cobra of the species called by the natives a 'Tom-tom beater,' i. e., the black cobra with red speckled mark on its hood. The Cingalese, I believe, think that they are the reincarnation of low caste natives, and more active than the common brown cobra.

"I had noticed at the time it had taken refuge in an ant-hill near the edge of the paddy field which formed one boundary of the new clearing upon which my bungalow stood, and situated about 200 feet from it. I led the charmer to this ant-hill. There I assured him that a snake almost certainly occupied the hole he squatted opposite to it and started blowing into it. The snake hissed and gave a sound similar to that of a bagpipe. After a long time, and when I had almost given up the idea of the snake being there still, the cobra protruded its head about an inch out of the hole in order presumably to see what was going on. The charmer pounced upon it, and seizing the head of the snake between his thumb and two fingers so that it could not open its mouth he pulled it out of the hole and nest and held it like that to the bungalow.

"He then tried to make it dance by holding a small piece of white rot above its head. The snake tried to escape several times, but was brought back again, and ultimately was induced to dance with its hood extended.

"I then asked the charmer what he would do if he happened to get bitten by a wild snake. He told me that he would take the snake and give it to me. I then, more as a joke than anything else, promised him five rupees if he would allow himself to be bitten by the snake he had just caught. He believed that he could stop it himself. But before I could stop him he had seized the snake by the neck and had thrust the forefinger of his right hand deep in its mouth, and when he withdrew it there were two punctures on each side of the lower lip, both punctures were bleeding slightly.

"He handed the cobra to his companion, who immediately shut him up in a snake basket, and the charmer at once took out of his waist-cloth a piece of charred bone, well known as the snake stone, and he then waited for some minutes, and I could see the veins on the back of his hands standing out like milk. He then held the couple of minutes or so the stone drop, and he told me that he had extracted all the poison from his body. He put the stone into it. In a moment, after a considerable amount of bubbling, there came to the surface a certain amount of an oily-looking liquid, pale straw in color."—New York World.

Roosevelt Libel Suit.

Supreme Court Says Action Against Press Publishing Co. Will Not Lie.

By unanimous decision, the supreme court of the United States on last Tuesday decided that the Federal Government could not maintain the so-called Panama canal libel suit against the Press Publishing company of New York. In the Federal courts of New York. In so holding, the court affirmed the decision of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, which had quashed the famous indictment.

In effect the decision was that the Federal court had no jurisdiction over the alleged offense, because the case might have been brought in a state court.

The Press Publishing company, publishers of the New York World, was indicted in March, 1909, in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York on a charge of libel.

In effect the alleged libel was the publication of articles, stating that Charles P. Taft, Douglas Robinson, and Wm. Nelson Cromwell, with J. P. Morgan and others, obtained control of the Panama route for about $3,000,000 and by the co-operation of Theodore Roosevelt, then president of the United States, and brother-in-law of Mr. Robinson, and Wm. H. Taft, the secretary of war, and brother of Mr. Taft, were enabled to effect the sale of the Panama canal to the United States at a profit of $36,000,000.

The United States claimed jurisdiction to punish the alleged libel on the theory that the publisher had committed a crime upon Federal territory at West Point, N. Y., and in the postoffice building in New York city.

It was argued that wherever the papers containing the alleged libel articles might have been printed that they were technically "published" upon these Federal reservations, and that the Federal government had the power to punish such publishing.

The indictment was quashed on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction of the crime of libel charged in the indictment. The United States appealed from this construction of the statute under which it claimed the indictment was authorized.

The decision of the court today dealt entirely with the act of the deal in 1898, under which the indictment was brought. The effect of this act was to incorporate the criminal laws of the several states in force on July 1, 1898, into the Federal statute and to make them applicable to Federal reservations within the various states. Among these state laws was a New York libel law.

The court, through Chief Justice White, stated that while the statute left no doubt where acts were done on reservations which were expressly prohibited and punished as crimes by a law of the United States, that law was dominant and controlling, yet, on the other hand, where no law of the United States had expressly provided for the punishment of offenses committed on reservations, all acts done on such reservations which were made criminal by the laws of the several states were left to be punished under the applicable state statutes.

Chief Justice White said that investigation plainly established that adequate means were afforded for punishing the circulation of a libel on a United States reservation by the state law, and in the state courts, without the necessity of resorting to the courts of the United States for redress.

"Second, that resort could not be had to the courts of the United States to punish the act of publishing a newspaper libel by circulating a copy of the newspaper on the reservation upon the theory that such publication was an independent offense, separate and distinct from the primary printing and publishing of the libelous article within the state of New York, without disregarding the laws of that state of such law, which was that there should be but a single prosecution and conviction.

"These propositions being true, it follows in the light of the construction which we have given the act of 1898 that the court was right in quashing the indictment as not authorized by that act. No other conclusion, we think, was possible, as the court could not have sustained the indictment without giving to the statute a meaning directly conflicting with the construction which we have affixed to it."

THE HECKLER.

Habits of the Individual Who Breaks Up Meetings.

The heckler is a necessary complement to every political meeting, so much so that he is now dignified with the title of the Voice. He hops up in the most surprising places with the most surprising questions and though he is the fly in the ointment so far as the candidate is concerned, to the man in the street he figures a welcome relief to the arid atmosphere of more formal meetings. He is the one who is so friendly and so frank as to be so much so that he is now dignified with the title of the Voice. He hops up in the most surprising places with the most surprising questions and though he is the fly in the ointment so far as the candidate is concerned, to the man in the street he figures a welcome relief to the arid atmosphere of more formal meetings.

THE SPY A NECESSITY.

His Methods Vary, But He Has Always Flourished and Always Will.

The spy has been a general, if not an inevitable, military institution almost since the beginning of armies and the practice of war. Joe's us, it will be remembered, set our spies into the Holy Land before the Israelites crossed the Jordan. The Roman army always had its spies; and, as an early instance of the utility of spying one may quote the example of King Alfred the Great, who went in disguise into the enemy's lines and discovered his secrets.

In the Middle Ages spies were everywhere; and in the middle of the 18th century the French army possessed a "chief of spies," and this post was held in succession by the ministry of war until the Revolution.

In our own times, practically every foreign power has military spies in its pay, says the London Express. There are continual incidents on the Franco-German frontier—the arrest of spies and the consequent international irritation—and more than once since 1870 such incidents have nearly led to the outbreak of another war.

Similarly it is notorious that the German army in this respect, as it is in every other, wonderfully well served by its extensive military agents in Great Britain, and that the lay of the country, the condition of roads and the situation of the fortifications as it possesses are all known quite as completely in Berlin as they are in London.

Spies are naturally divided into two classes. On the one hand there are the men who are willing to betray their own country for money payments and who are rightly regarded as infinitely despicable.

On the other hand there are the men who, like the famous military agents of the American Revolutionary war, obtained from Gen. Benedict Arnold the plans for the defeat of the British. Arnold was a traitor; he was a patriot. He was arrested and sentenced by Washington to be hanged.

There can be no quarrel with the sentiment, since the custom of all nations is to regard as a shameful and dishonorable death—the lot of the captured military spy. But Great Britain showed its appreciation of Arnold's patriotism by the erection of a monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey, where his remains are now interred.

In the case of Cyrus Field, the projector of the Atlantic cable, and a patriotic American, erected a statue to Andre at Paris, while the memory of the great engineer was kept alive by the fact that a large sum of money was set aside for his maintenance in the same country.

Generally, a military spy captured during a time of peace is not tried by a court-martial, but by the ordinary courts of law. The law against spies was passed in July, 1903, the French law in 1848, and under it the French government has made comparatively light—from two to five years' imprisonment, with a fine of from $200 to $1,000.

In many cases, one may note that Europe was covered with Pitt's spies at the end of the 18th century, and that they were very numerous. From the time of the American Revolution, the demand for an army of espionage was popularly ascribed to them.

In addition to the spy engaged in the ordinary work of the government of discovering military secrets, there is the spy who is engaged in the recovery of information for private interests. Such spies have always been employed by the police of every nation, and they are now more numerous than ever when the government is autocratic and opposition is underground.

During the unrest that followed the removal of Louis Philippe in France, a national institution, Burghley had an army of spies, and the French government has always been engaged in the employment of spies. Such spies have always been employed by the police of every nation, and they are now more numerous than ever when the government is autocratic and opposition is underground.
