Les-Miserables---Hugo.

We assume, of course, that every-body has read the greatest novel ever written—Les-Miserables. The leading character, Jean Valjean, very poor, and unable to obtain work to support his widowed mother and sister, who were starving, in a moment of sore temptation, born of despair, stole a loaf of bread from a shop window, which act was the beginning of a sea of troubles. Moral: Now, if that particular loaf of bread was one of the kind that we sell-white, soft, moist, fresh, nutritious, with a lovely brown complexion, then it was both natural and pardonable for Jean Valjean to abstract and appropriate it, but the proprietor of the shop should have been legally punished for placing such a tantalizing temptation in the way of his fellowman. Our bread comes fresh and we wish you to buy it promptly while it is fresh. We feel sure that as soon as the people of the town and surrounding country learn, as they do from this "Ad," that they will promptly buy every loaf we buy.
