THE WESTERN CALAMITY.

CINCINNATI AND LOUISVILLE THE PRINCIPAL SUFFERERS.

The Ohio River Overflows Its Banks and Destroys Many Lives and Millions of Property.

LOUISVILLE, Feb. 15.—When the sun rose yesterday morning over the flooded districts it revealed a scene of desolation, the like of which has never been witnessed in the history of the city.

The chief center of attraction was at the Point, the scene of the dreadful calamity the night before, and when revealed in all its nakedness it showed even worse than the most vivid imagination could picture it.

When the news was heralded at early morning that the great dam at the head of the "cut-off" had succumbed to the fury of the waves, the whole city was in a bustle, and hundreds started immediately for the scene of the disaster, among them being the relief committees, bringing aid to the sufferers.

All morning a constant stream of people filed down the several streets and walked up and down the railroad fill, which afforded the only safe, dry footing from which a good view could be obtained.

Standing at the foot of Cherry street, and nearly the central part of the ruin, the scene was a pitiful one to look at.

The flood, after the first rush back to the foot of the street, was made, rose slowly and surely and nothing was visible but ruin, and not a single building, except the two large manufactories, remained standing on the original foundations, many of them having been moved several squares.

The passageways between the streets, where the water had originally passed, were completely blocked, and the whole field of water was an unbroken relief of upturned houses, floating roofs, broken timbers and moving buildings. A hundred boats were hurrying here and there, pushing their way through the rubbish to all the accessible houses, and returning to land with the skills loaded down with whatever of value they could obtain.

Half a dozen owners were on the bank next each boat, and claim whatever belonged to them, bearing safely out of danger, high and dry upon the streets, and already enormous crowds of curious spectators splashing in the water, and shouting and pointing at each other's shoulders out of the stretch of water.

Do you see those two chimneys over there?" said a man on the shore, pointing as he spoke to a spot where a pile of brick could be seen just peeping from the top of a roof, at the corner of Hancock street. "Well, that house originally belonged at the foot of Venet street, and continued, and first rush of the water, and drifted down until it landed against that luncheon where it now is."
