"Look at life as we see it in Greenville, and what appears to be the one thing needful to man? The grand aim of our efforts and our toils? What, more than anything else, appears to be the great inspirer of our activity? I answer, The possession of this world's goods! Our people must make money, let it cost what it will. Business is first and last, and everything must bend to business. Our factories must pay Christians their dividends, if poor little boys and girls work ten and twelve hours out of the twenty-four for it! The so-called Christians will have the last pound of flesh, if it strips the widow and the orphan of their rightful possessions! Real estate must pay a good per cent. if Christians have to rent their property for bar-rooms and gambling saloons! Our rising municipality must have a revenue to support its government, even at the terrible cost of putting the worst temptations before its citizens almost at every street corner. And all for what? To raise money. This is the only less for at every street corner. And all for what?
To raise money. This is the only plea for all these bar-rooms in Greenville.
