SIXTEEN YEARS AFTER. The Battle of Sharpsburg. Detroit Free Press.

Sharpsburg! I ride up the long street through the quiet old town to the west of the ridge on which now stands a national cemetery, and from this point the eye can see where every brigade and division fought on that memorable 17th day of September, 1862.

It is the most beautiful landscape the eye ever rested on, and it looks to-day almost exactly as it did when the sun rose on that beautiful autumn morning to be lost sight of in clouds of smoke and death.

HOOPER BEGAN THE FIGHT. On the right almost before it was light enough for the men to see to dress their battle line.

AFTER NINETEEN YEARS. I rode over the ground to-day with the men who fought on either side in those grim woods that day.

A FIGHT OF DEVIIS. If Jackson was forced down in the center Lee was no longer a general.

THE DUNKER CHURCH. A mile or so above the village. Shot and shell fell down around this building until fields seemed to be being plowed, and as I sat on the grass and looked up to count the scars on the walls, my hand touched a fragment of shell thrown there from Hooker's batteries.

PORTERS RESERVES. From the Dunker Church I can see across the valley where the Federal reserves Porter's 15,000 reserves lay all that day behind the dark pines without firing a shot.

BAGGING LEE'S ARMY. What a storm the North raised because McClellan did not bag Lee's army! Hooker, Mansfield and Sumner driven back to the Dunker Church.

AT SUNSET. And so as the sun goes down and the shadows begin to fall over mountain and valley, I sit my horse beneath a battle scarred tree for one more look across the historic field.

at Sharpsburg would again place McClellan at the head of the column. The thought for an excuse as soon as Lee was beaten.

IT WAS A SLAUGHTER PEN. And worse yet. Heads, arms, legs, feet, hands and bloody scraps of mangled humanity filled the road for half a mile.

A Remarkable Exhibit. Every display at the exposition is worthy of study, but the exhibit made by the Richmond and Danville railroad and its combinations is of unusual significance.

The U. S. Army. General Sherman to-day submitted his annual report to the Secretary of War, including a mass of statistics of general and commanding general's divisions and departments.
