GRANT'S MEMOIRS.

Reminiscences of the Great War.

General Grant's book, to be published in a few months, will contain the following reminiscences of Lee's surrender:

I found General Lee had been brought into our lines and conducted to the house belonging to Mr. McKean, and was there with one of his staff officers waiting my arrival. The head of his column was occupying a hill, a portion of which was an apple orchard, across a little valley from the court house. Several of his banners were drawn up in line of battle on the crest of a hill on the South side of the same valley.

THE APPLE TREE STORY.

Before starting what took place between General Lee and myself, I will give all the details of the narrative of General Lee and the famous apple tree. Wars produce many stories of fiction, some of which are told until they are believed. The war of the rebellion was fruitful in the same way. The story of the apple tree is one of those fictions, with a slight foundation of fact. As I have said, there was an apple orchard on the side of the hill occupied by the confederate forces. I found when I first met Lee that he was sitting on a bench in the shade of the tree, which had a little embankment in front of it. He was sitting on a bench in the shade of the tree, which had a little embankment in front of it. He was sitting on a bench in the shade of the tree, which had a little embankment in front of it.

THE MEETING WITH LEE.

When I went into the house I found General Lee. We greeted each other, and after shaking hands took our seats. What his feelings were at that moment I do not know, but he was very dignified and with an impressive face, it was impossible to say whether he felt inwardly glad that he had finally come, or whether he felt sadly over the result and was too weary to show it. Whatever his feelings were they were entirely concealed from observation, but my own feelings, which had been quite apparent on the reception of his letter, were sad and depressed. I felt that I was meeting a man who had fought so long and gallantly, and had suffered so much for the cause which I believed to be one of the worst for which a people ever fought, and for which I had myself fought. I felt that I was meeting a man who had fought so long and gallantly, and had suffered so much for the cause which I believed to be one of the worst for which a people ever fought, and for which I had myself fought.

THE FIRST BATTLE OF THE CIVIL WAR.

As soon as the enemy saw us they decamped as fast as their horses would carry them. I think that I can remember the first time I saw the enemy. I think that I can remember the first time I saw the enemy. I think that I can remember the first time I saw the enemy.

A TALE OF LONG AGO.

A Mysterious Stranger in Banks County, Ga.

The little county of Banks has its story to tell of a mysterious stranger who appeared there some years ago, before Banks county was cut off from Franklin, and is recollected by a great many who are now living in Franklin and Banks counties, who remember the man as being a stranger in the flesh. The name is fictitious, as he has relatives still living, good citizens, and it would do good to them to bring up things of the past.

In the year 1839 or thereabouts a man came from North Carolina, making his way, so he said, to Florida. He came into Bushyville district, in Banks county (then Franklin), and coming to where the road crossed the creek, he saw a man who was milking him, this man whom we will call William Harrington, took through the woods and brought up to a house on the Hudson river. He asked for work, and told his tale about going to Florida, and that he could not find the direction he was traveling which caused him to go through the woods and to come to the house the back way instead of coming by the creek and crossing the bridge. Harrington made himself agreeable, and being a good conversationalist, soon made many friends in the neighborhood, and expressed himself as being a man of good character, and saying if he could get employment that he would stop there instead of going on to Florida. Other farmers in the neighborhood gave him work, Harrington being a man of good character, and desiring to get an education. In the meantime he had let it be known that he was a grandson of one of Virginia's greatest statesmen, but that his father was a man of dissolute habits, and that he had been brought up by his grandfather, who never gave him a regular education. Harrington made a number of friends, joined the Baptist church, and before long he was a consistent Christian. He commenced going to school, started in the spelling book, and before the year was out reading Latin and learning very fast. The next year he taught school in Jackson county, and then he went to the Northeastern railroad now runs. He had a splendid school and the patrons were well pleased with his manner of teaching, though some of the older heads were a little suspicious of him, as he had acquired his education entirely too quick, and some thought that he was a well educated man before he came to Banks county. His kindness and gentleness toward all men, and his open suspicion, and Harrington ranked as one of the best Christians in the community. He joined the Masonic lodge about this time, and married a young girl whose name he has forgotten, but she was a negro fellow and a piece of land. As soon as married he began receiving letters stating that he had a large legacy left him, but that it had got into a lawyer's hands, and he was to go to New York to get it out and secure it to himself. It was also hinted that Harrington was one of a gang of horse thieves who stole stock in North Carolina, and were now in Florida, and that Harrington made long trips to Virginia, and generally managed to get money out of his father-in-law to pay expenses. His next move was to commence prospecting for copper on an adjoining plantation. He had a partner in the venture, a mulatto negro was hired from two negro traders in the county and Harrington tried to get several wealthy men to go in with him, and he would soon develop a mine, and he would be rich. Harrington returned to his home in Banks county, and he would bring back a legacy that would amount to thousands. After being absent several months in North Carolina and Virginia, Harrington returned to his home in Banks county, and he would bring back a legacy that would amount to thousands.
