During the past few years the methods of Geographical Teaching have been more thoroughly studied than ever before. Certain fundamental principles ar now universally accepted, among which is-first : The mind of the learner must go from the known to, the unknown. from what can be seen with eyes to what can only be seen by the mind, by succassive steps. These steps are arranged in the order of dependence. For example, the child can see the school-room. He learns the relative positions of various and we cannot honor those we pity. objects in it, their direction from each other, and their distances apart. He their children into the world, and upon learns to draw a disgram of the room. their shoulders rest the great responsiaccurately representing the places the bility of teaching them by precept and different objects occupy. Next he goes outside the school room and learns east, west, north, and south. Then he draws a map of the school-yard. and learns to bound it by the familiar objects to which it is joined. Then his these animals. scale is enlarged ; he measures a yard, a rod, and learns what the distance of a mile means. - The second fundamental principle is that the mind of the learner must be so trained that it can conceive accurately, from maps and pictures, how a part of the source poks that it has never seen. This second step requires the cultivation of the imagination. Without such discipline a map is an unsuggestive surface of black lines and combinations of colors.
