From the Suthern Cultivator. The hariness of the farmer demands a knowledge of the laws of nature so far as they relate to phenomena connected with the soil, plants, animals, insects and meteorology. With a knowledge of these laws he can conduct all of his operations in conformity with them and thus attain success. All violations of these laws must cause discomfiture. No wise lawgiver ever enacts a law without affixing a penalty, and surely the Author of the laws governing the material universe was too wise to omit so necessary an appendage or consequence of violation. The end of all agriculture production is animal consumption either as food or dothing for animals, man included. The never be seriously portrayed, as an elefactory which converts cotton into yarns of converting these into cloth to another into more valuable animal products, such vegetable substances utilized by these animal factories the greater the dividends declared to the owners of the factories.

The farmer's first business is with the soil, the great storehouse of energy derived from the sun. He must study the character and needs of his soil with and chemical constituents. He must see roots of the plant may readily penetrate and gather the food necessary for buildble. The same is true to-day, and more; plants alone can organize the matters of dead earth and air into life. The farmer, therefore, must learn the laws of plantgrowth and nutrition and the conditions which contribute most effectively to the fulfilment of the destiny to which man has devoted it. This involves skillful manipulation of the soil physically and chemically with special reference to enable the plant to appropriate the material needed to its own advantage. Since plants take all their food either in solution in waters as the vehicle or as gases, meteorological conditions are of prime importance. How then, shall we regard the plans? Certainly as a factory in which the crude material of soil is covverted into more valuable vegetable products capable of being ultilized by

This becomes especially apparent when we consider the fact that a by-product of this animal factory—the manure contributes in such | whirlwind. "There!" exclaimed the important degree to the reproduction of captain, in a relieved voice-"thereits own raw material.

Let us take the sheep, for instance, to illustrate this point. Grass organizes the substances of soil and air into food for the sheep, or, if used as hay, into an article of commerce. If converted into hay for market, costly labor must be expended in harvesting, housing, baling and drawing to market. If ultilized directly by the sheep we have further expense connected with it, but it is manufactured into wool and mutton by the animal which demands nothing at our hands except an occasional ration of salt. If converted into hay for market, whoever purchases the hay must pay the grower, not only the cost of growing, but that of harvesting and marketing, and if the I ever could." consumer lives at a distance from the hav field he must pay the cost of transportation and the merchants' profit besides. Now if he can afford to pay these charges in addition to the cost of growing the hay, and yet makes a profit by feeding it, surely he who ultizes the quiet sheep to manufacture his hay in his fields should realize much more, since the manure, being returned to the soil, is only robbed of the plant food sold in Our people do not seem to appreciate the fact that the conversion of all available material derived from the soil into the more valuable and compact animal products without the intervention of so much costly human labor constitutes a most important factor in determining the question of success or failure. They do not sufficiently appreciate the fact that of the stuff." nearly all of the nitrogen of the food consumed by a grown animal and all of the phosphoric acid and potash containand liquid manure. Both are most valuable feedstuffs which would be equally valuable as manure after passing through the ani mal if the solid and liquid excreta were saved. Lawes estimates the value of the manure from a ton of cotton seed meal at $27 in England. The meal costs us here much less than that. His Whig principles, however, were not in favor with the Democrate, who held the fort and the result was that objections were raised to his asserting his right to vote, and the captain was finally conveyed to the door, very much against his will. The hardy sailor, a tall, well-built man, considered the advisability of "clearing the place out." but the counsels of a friend prevailed, and the captain walked back to his veseel, where, after sundry potions, he fell asleep. Early in the evening he awoke, and announced that he was going up into the town again. His faithful friend accompanied him to restrain any undue exhibition of animal spirits which might be the result of excessive use of another kind of spirits. and together they walked up the street. Sherman is Discouraged.

WASHINGTON, May 15 .- Senator Sherman talks about politics among his friends with more freedom than he would in-dulge in in addressing the public by means of a speech or an interview. He is reported to have expressed to some riends within a few days considerable discouragement at the prospect both as to his party and as to himself. He regretted deeply that the Presidential campaign had been pitched on the Southern issue. He said the people in New York didn't care whether the negroes in the South voted or not; on the whole they rather preferred that the negroes should not wote. What the people in New York wanted was business. They wanted the South to prosper. The South had better government and more order and more credit and offered a more attractive field for enterprise with the white people in control, and consequently New Yorkers
