THE OLD BOOKKEEPERE

When I tell you, my only friend, to whom I so razely write and whom I more rarely see, that my lonely life has not been without love for woman, you will perhaps laugh or doubt.

"What!" you will say. "That gaunt old specter in his attic, with his books, his tobacco and his three flowerpots? He would not know that there is such a word as love did he not encounter it now and then in his reading."

True, I have divided my days between the books in a rich man's counting room and those in my attic. True, again, I have never been more than merely passable to look at even in my best days. Yet I have loved a woman.

During the five years when my elder brother lay in the hospital across the river, where he died, it was my custom to visit him every Sunday. I enjoyed the afternoon walk to the suburbs, where the air has more of nature in it, especially that portion of the walk which lay upon the bridge. More life than was usual upon the bridge moved there on Sunday. Then the cars were crowded with people seeking the parks. Many crossed on foot, stopping to look idly down at the dark and sluggish water.

One afternoon as I stood thus leaning over the parapet the sound of a woman's gentle laugh caused me to turn and ocularly inquire its source. The woman and a man were approaching. At the side of the woman walked soberly a handsome dog, a collie. There was that in their appearance and manner which plainly told me that here were husband and wife of the middle class, intelligent, but poor, out for a stroll. That they were quite devoted to each other was easily discoverable.

The man looked about thirty years of age, was tall, slender and with neither strong nor handsome, but amiable, face. He was doubt-less a clerk fit to be som-thing bet-

The woman was perhaps twentyfour. She was not quite beautiful, yet she was more than pretty. She was of good size and figure, and the short plush coat that she wore and the manner in which she kept her hands thrust in the pockets thereof gave to her a dauntless air which the quiet and affectionate expression of her face softened.

She was a brunette, her eyes being large and distinctly dark brown, her face having that peculiar complexion which is most quickly affected by any change in health.

The color of her cheeks, the dark rim under her eyes and other indefinable signs indicated some radical ailment. In the quick glance, that I had of that pair while the woman was smiling a feeling of pity came over me. I have never detected the exact cause of that emotion. Perhaps in the woman's face I read the trace of past bodily and mental suffering, perhaps a subtle mark that death had already set there.

Neither the woman nor her husband noticed me as they passed. The dog regarded me cautiously with the corner of his eye. I probably would never have thought of the three again had I not seen them upon the bridge under exactly the same circumstances on the next

So these young and then happy people waiked here every Sunday, I thought. This perhaps was an event looked forward to throughout the week. The husband doubtless was kept a prisoner and slave at his desk from Monday morning until Saturday night, with respite only for eating and sleeping. Such cases are common even with people who can think and all the same than the same t think and who have some taste for luxury and who are not devoid of love for the beautiful.

The sight of happiness which exists despite the cruelty of fate and man and which is temporarily un-conscious of its own liability to interruption and extinction invariably fills me with sar less. And the sadness which arose at the contemplation of these two beings begot in me a strange sympathy for and interest in them.

On Sundays thereafter I would go early to the bridge and wait until they passed, for it proved that this was their habitual Sunday wa? Sometimes they would pause and join those who gazed down at the black river. I would now and again resume my journey toward the hospital while they thus stood, and I would look back from a distance. The bridge would then appear to me an abrupt ascent, rising to the dense city, and their two figures would stand out clearly against the background. It became a matter of care to me to observe each Sunday whether the health of either had varied during the previous week. The husband, always pale and slight, showed little change, and that infrequently. But the fluctuations of the woman as indicated by complexion, gait, expression and otherwise were numerous and pronounced. Often she looked brighter and more robust than on the the preceding Sunday. Her face would be then rounded out, and the dark crescents beneath her eyes would be less marked. Then I found ship does he use?" Prue—"Oh, he may be ship does he use?" Prue—"Oh, he may be ship does he use?" Prue—"Oh, he may be ship does he use?"

cheeks had receded slightly, the healthy luster of the eyes had given way to an ominous glow; the warning of death had returned. Then my heart would sink, and, sighing, I would murmur inaudibly:

"This is one of the bad Sundays." There came a time when every Sunday was a bad one.

What made me love this woman? Simply the unmistakable completeness and constancy of her devotion to her husband, the absorption of the woman in the wife. Had the strange ways of chance ever made known to her my feeling and had she swerved from that devotion even to render me back love for love, then my own adoration for her would surely have departed.

Yes, I loved her if to fill one's life with thoughts of a woman, if in fancy to see her face by day and night, if to have the will to die for her or to bear pain for her-if these and many more things mean love.

· My richest joy was to see her content with her husband, and the darkest woe of my life was to anticipate the termination of their hap-

So the Sundays passed. One afternoon I waited until almost dusk, yet the couple did not appear.

For seven Sundays in succession I did not meet them upon their wonted walk.

On the eighth Sunday I saw the dog first, then the man. The latter was looking over the railing. The woman was not with him. Apprehensively I sought with my eyes his face. Much grief and loneliness were depicted there.

Was he or I the greater mourner, I wonder? I suppose two years passed after that day ere I again beheld the widower, whose name I do not and probably never shall know, upon the bridge. The dog was not with him this time. It was a fine, sunny afternoon in May. Grief was no longer in his face. By his side was a very pretty, animated, rosy little woman whom I had never seen before. They walked close to each other, and she looked with the utmost tenderness into his face. She evidently was not yet entirely acoustomed to the wedding ring which I observed upon her finger.

I think that tears came to my eyes at this sight. Those great brown eyes, the plush sack, the love-ly face that had borne the impress of sorrow and so speedily had felt death—these might never have existed so soon had they been forgotten by the one being in the world for whom that face had worn the aspect of a perfect love.

Yet one upon whom those eyes never rested has remembered, and surely the memory of her is mine to wed, since he whose right it was to cherish it had allowed himself to be divorced from it in so brief a

The memory of her is with me always, fills my soul, beautifies my life, makes green and radiant this existence which all who know me think cold, bleak, empty, repellent. You will not laugh, then, my friend, when I tell you that love is not to me a thing unknown.

So runs a part of the last letter to my father that the old bookkeeper ever wrote.

Largest and Smallest Book.

The British museum owns the largest book in the world and the smallest. The largest is an atlas of the fifteenth century. It is seven feet high. Between its generous leaves a tall man's head is hidden. Its stout binding and ponderous clasps make it seem as substantial as the walls of a room. The smallest is a tiny "Bijou Almanac"—less than an inch square, bound in dainty red morocco and easily to be concealed in the finger of a lady's glove. These two extremes of the printer's art might well stand at the beginning and the end of the amazing thirty-seven miles of shelves filled with books which make up a part of the printed treasures of the great English library.
