A New Enterprise.

The Corona Mill, which a very short time ago was only an idea, is now commencing operations. The mill is situated on a hosiery mill—nothing else is manufactured. The mill is a double story wooden structure, 84x90 feet, and is equipped with all the modern appliances and machinery necessary to the completion of first-class goods. In addition to the dyeing, drying and singeing rooms and the revolving wringer, there are 27 ribbing machines, 20 knitting machines and 10 looper. This amount of machinery gives a capacity of 200 dozen pairs of hose per day. The machinery is beautiful in construction and remarkable in adjustment. On many different motions they make, unaided by operatives in the accomplishment of the work for which they are designed, is truly wonderful. The Manager, W. A. Power, says they are simply making a beginning now, as the operatives secured so far have to be trained. He prefers to secure operatives here at home, even if it be necessary to train them. The mill will work fifty operatives when fully under way, and there is now an opening for twenty-five bright girls at this mill. The mill throughout is clean and neat, the machinery almost noiseless, the work light and it is in no respect an undesirable place to work. The floor space of this mill is sufficient for the placing of machinery which will give a daily output of 600 dozen pairs. This knitting mill is a great addition to the cotton industry of our city, and the conversation had with Manager Power developed the fact that this industry makes a necessary development here in Anderson, of a kindred industry. The yarn used in manufacturing hosiery differs materially from the yarn spun for the manufacture of cloth. The former must be soft and loosely spun in order to give the soft, smooth finish demanded in hosiery; the latter is hard and would not answer at all. None of our mills are equipped for the manufacture of hosiery yarn; indeed, its manufacture requires machinery altogether different to the spinning frames now used. A spinning machine known as a "tub" must be used. In cloth mills these tubs have long since been supplanted by ring spinning machines. The Corona Mill will soon be using 1,000 pounds of this yarn per day, and their experience already has been that it is difficult to make a tub for the amount needed, the tubs made for the purpose being unable to fill their orders. Why should Anderson not engage in the manufacture of this yarn? A demand for one or two thousand pounds per day at home would not be a bad start, or a start which would soon be spreading out in every direction. The Corona mill is located near the Southern freight depot, across the street from the ball grounds. The effect on the neighborhood is E. L. Holland, of Philadelphia, but originally from the State of Maine.

After lying idle for nearly 12 months, due to the want of electrical power, mill No. 2 of the Anderson Cotton Mills presents a busy scene once more. Nearly all of the machinery of this enormous mill is now in operation. Some changes in the position of the machinery are yet to be made and additional machinery started up, but that already in operation is almost bewildering to the uninitiated visitor. To ground on one floor, in perfect line, eighty 45 inch cards, and spinning machines aggregating 41,600 spindles, and on another floor, perfectly lined up, 1,000 looms, and all in operation and perfectly performing the work for which they were designed, is a highly interesting sight. This is Anderson's largest mill, and, under the control of Superintendent Cumcock, has undergone some interesting changes. The interior of the building has been newly painted. The walls are white with a broad scarlet line next to the floor. The painting overhead is also white, but the shafting hangers, humidifiers and all piping is in delicate green. The floors are perfectly clean, the machinery as bright as when first put in, and there is an absence of flying lint. The humidifiers-work perfectly and there is no scarcity of them. Changes have been made in the grouping of the machines and such changes made in their adjustment as was necessary to the manufacture of different and finer grades of cloth. Goods are now manufactured the warp of which is size 30 yarn and 30 to 45 filling. Much of it is converters cloth and varies in width from 72 to 80 inches. Several patterns of finery are manufactured, and the entire product of the mill passes through the hands of the bleachers before being ready for market. One of the interesting points of this mill is to see the long lines of 170 spinning machines in operation and the total absence of shafting and belts. This is accomplished by the use of 57 electrical motors, one to every two spinning frames. In two weeks from now there will be 200 spinning frames and 190 of these motors. Another interesting point connected with this mill is the absence of child operatives. None appear to be under the age of 18 or 20. When questioned as to this, Superintendent Cumcock remarked that his experience with child labor had not been satisfactory; that the cost of looking after it was an offset to all saving in wages, and the grade of work performed by them was unsatisfactory; that he is carefully selecting his operatives and is doing everything in his power to make their surroundings in the mill neat, comfortable and pleasant. This mill is now using 1,500 electrical horse-power. In a few days it will be increased to 1,800 horse-power, and then the mill will be up to its full capacity. In mill No. 1, which forms the other part of the Anderson Cotton Mills, changes have also been made, which are designed to be more convenient and economic. Taken altogether, these are perhaps the best equipped mills in the South.

Daughters of the Confederacy End 7th Annual Convention.

In spite of bad weather and muddy streets the 7th annual Convention of the U. D. C. has passed into history as a highly important and satisfactory occasion to the noble women who were present as delegates, and as a social event long to be remembered by Andersonians. The weather was not permitted to interfere in the least with the work in hand nor with the program of entertainment decided upon by our appreciative citizens. Wednesday morning broke clear and bright as if casting a benediction upon the work of love which had begun under such unfavorable conditions. By 11 o'clock the convention had assembled in the Court room and entered upon the discussion of business matters. Reports were received and disposed of with promptness, interesting papers were read and appropriate resolutions were adopted for various purposes. Miss Mary Poppenheim, chairman of the State Historical Committee, a gifted lady, read to the Convention a carefully prepared address touching matters of interest and importance to the work being done by herself and associates in collecting historical data covering the period of the Confederacy. This address was referred to by many who heard it as being the best delivered during the Convention. The session lasted until after the hour of four. There was much important business to dispose of before the election of officers for another year and the majority were determined to finish it. Motions and ballots were promptly voted down. The hour approached very nearly to 3 o'clock when an adjournment was reached. The result of the election of new officers was as follows: President, Mrs. James Conner, of Clinton; First Vice President, Mrs. Martha Conner, of Parisville; Second Vice President, Mrs. The White, of Johnston; Third Vice President, Mrs. Robert Wright, of Newberry; Fourth Vice President, Mrs. Lulu Ayer Vandiver, of R. E. Lee Chapter, Anderson; Recording Secretary, Miss Margaret Evans, of R. E. Lee Chapter, Anderson; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. J. G. Shannon, Jr., of Camden; Treasurer, Miss Estelle Izler, of Blackville; Auditor, Mrs. Rufus Page, of Dixie Chapter, Anderson. The following appropriations were made: For Woman's book, $100; for Wade Hampton monument, $50; for Jefferson Davis monument fund, $10.

The closing event was a banquet at night by the Dixie Chapter, to which the Convention, the R. E. Lee Chapter, the Veterans and the Sons of the Veterans were invited. It was held at the old building on the crest of University hill, which became so closely identified with the history of the Confederacy during the last years of the war and the first of the reconstruction period. In this building the dies and machinery for stamping Confederate money were deposited for safe keeping when the enemy was on the eve of invading the State, and from this building they were taken by the enemy and scattered and scattered over the neighboring grounds. It was in this building, the enemy was quartered immediately after the surrender, whose presence was intended to intimidate and awe our people into submission to conditions they were too feeble to resist. More than a generation has passed since then and this same building becomes a banquet hall of the worshippers of the dead and living heroes of the Southern Confederacy. In 1865 a hostile force with Federal decorations, in 1902, a reconstructed people, but Confederate elements on every side, and the memory of its dead and living heroes the one idea that thrilled and inspired the assemblage. A wonderful change, but one which, while affording an opportunity for noble men and women to apotheosize the dead and honor the little remnant of the living heroes they gathered, was free from the slightest trace of animosity toward those who opposed them in that remarkable struggle, which has become and will continue to be the most interesting and thrilling chapters of the world's history. The banquet hall was beautiful in decorations. The walls presented a gallery of portraits of dead and living heroes of the Confederacy, above and around each of which drooped the folds of Confederate flags, the staffs of which, where they crossed, were confined and ornamented with a large gilt star, bearing in the center a cotton bloom, full blown, the emblem of the Dixie Chapter. At the end of the hall, almost enveloped in United States flags, was the likeness of Washington, while the five windows, which light the rostrum here situated, were also lavishly decorated with United States flags, white bunting being the background. On either side from these, extending to the entrance, were groups of Confederate flags tastefully arranged and made more attractive by the likenesses of Confederate heroes, among them being Robt. E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson, Gen. W. W. Humphreys, Gov. J. L. Orr, Judge J. P. Beall, Col. J. N. Brown, Col. D. A. Ledbetter, Col. H. R. Vandiver and others, and a copy of the ordinance of secession and the charter of the Dixie Chapter. A row of four columns extend the length of the hall and between the two center columns was suspended a large frame covered with scarlet bunting, the two sides of which bore in large letters, formed of lint cotton, the word "Dixie." Through the center of the hall, the entire length, four tables were spread and brilliantly lighted with wax candles in rosy red held in improvised candelabra; plates for 250 were spread and all were taken. The decorations throughout, intertwined as they were with ivy, presented, under the soft lights, a beautiful and charming effect. The toasts and responses were appropriate, elegant and inspiring. Mrs. J. M. Patrick was toastmistress and the following were proposed and responded to: "Our President," responded to by Miss Mary Poppenheim. "The R. E. Lee Chapter," responded to by Mrs. S. Bleckley. "Man," responded to by Mrs. J. J. Fretwell. "The Sons of Veterans," responded to by Gen. H. H. Watkins. "The Veterans," by D. H. Russell. Thus ended the Seventh Annual Convention of the U. D. C. of South Carolina. The souvenirs presented to the retiring officers and delegates were sterling silver spoons, in the bowls of which is the picture of the historic old building and with the word "Dixie" on the handle. The souvenirs given at the reception by the R. E. Lee Chapter were beautiful portrait buttons, bearing the likeness of Gen. R. E. Lee, brightened by a delicate little bow of red and white ribbon. Anderson was delighted to entertain the Convention and the Convention leaves the impression that it was pleased with Anderson.
