AMELESS; a Novel. By Fanny Murdaugh Downin. Raloigh: Smith & Co. 1806. We owe our copy of this novel—from the pen of one of the most accomplished of the female writers of the South—to some unknown source, to which we are gratified for bringing to our knowledge one of the most graceful, tasteful, and felici ous of all the fictions produced among our seversale authors for many a day. We say this without hesitation, and commend the story especially to all that class which can appreciate ingo mious art, a flowing and graceful style, an easy, unaffected manner, and a tale wrought out, in spite of many difficulties of the subject, te the excellent as to make us regret one failure of the author—as we think it—in the portrait of Miss GOLDING. Here, it seems to us, that her right and has failed somewhat of its cunning; and, in judicious pretension of vulgarity, she has over passed those limits of a beautiful propriety, which in all the other characters, is so uniformly appa HAUGHTON was the cynosure—the presiding deity; with such a beautiful collection of sweet spirits due allowance for the insolence which mere wealth, without accomplishments, is upt to en-gender, Miss Golding would still find herself rebulked to a certain degree of modesty, meekness and simplicity, in such a circle;—especially as the wealth of Lady HAUGHTON, and of the family of the Chesters, was more than equal to her own; and Lady Hauchton, at least, had no reason to conclinate vulgarity of any sort merely because of its wealth. The atmosphere of such a circle would subdue and restrain such a mere animal as Miss Golding; nor is it possible for such a woman, breathing such an atmosphere, not to be forced to imbibe its sentiments, at least, and, in some degree, to adopt its habits and observances.

We can easily understand that the author had two objects in view, if no more, in her portraiture of this ridiculous woman. In the first place, the character is a natural conception, and, as such, is all large circles, and possibly in many small ones. She serves as a foil to the better ones, and affords variety to the general interest of a book. illustrates, at the same time, the insolence of real wealth, acquired by accident, or the caprice of fortune; and serves to rebuke the tendency of the

So far, all is well in the design of the s Our charge is that she has been guilty of such an exaggeration of the vulgar portraiture as to imof a narrative which is otherwise exquisitely true to good taste and to nature. We repeat that such a woman as Miss Golding could not breathe such ast circle, was to disparage its own claims to our sympathies and respect.

We can understand how a selfish and even malignant man like Osborne should be tolerated; since, openly, he appears as the well-bred gentle-man. If his morals are bad, his manners, in sonicty, are selon tes regles. It is the objection to Miss Golding, that her manners are so had too bad for the circle; so bad, indeed, that we do not uspect her of any morals whatever, and do not care into what circle she shall fall.

It is because "Nameless" is not an ordinary book In the Senate, a petition from the Legislature of New Mexico was presented, asking indemnity from that we object to the exaggeration in the portraiture of this vulgar woman. It impairs the harmony of the story, fust as a rude character in red and yellow would impair the beauties of a Titian or Claude Lorraine. And we confess to a sentimen of surprise, that a writer whose general portrai-ture is so nicely and delicately sketched,—with such an excellent sense of the proprieties—that she should have fallen into the exaggeration of this this charming little volume.

Of Mrs. Downing's writings, hitherto, we have known little or nothing. A few graceful little poems are all that have met our eyes. We are told that she has written other volumes of prose iction, such as the present, which are all spoke of with favor, if not admiration. We trust that she will persevere in the present province of leters, which seems to come naturally to her hands Nothing here is on stilts. There is no vain striv ing at the sensational or spasmodic. All is easy, graceful, natural, and very artist-like. Good tast she certainly possesses in an eminent degree, purity of thought as of style, and that sense of nice propriety which is required to be the very foundation of good taste. We commend to her the choice of Home subjects.

The English, themselves, give us quite enough of their fictions from high and fashionable life. Let us leave them in pessession of these topics. Let Mrs. Downine next give us just such a story as this, and lay the scene in the good old "City of the Oaks"—Baleigh—or in her own pleasant town of Charlotte, and we promise her a wider reputa or Charlotte, and we promise her a water reputa-tion and better compensation than she could pos-sibly acquire from delving in the foreign and con-temporary material. From a statement of English publications in 1866, in the Bookseller, it appears that the whole number of new books and new editions was 4204, of which religions works were most numerous, being 849; next came children's books, 544; then novels, 330. SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF THE DAILY WEWE

UPON THE EVE OF AN EXPLOSION. Washington, February 4.—It is evident to any one at present watching national affairs in Washington, that events are ripening which will precipitate either this week or next—certainly within the formight—a grand denouement in some one of the conspira-cies and counter-efforts of the day. The long im-pending dissensions in the Radical ranks has at ength become so patpable and outspoken an the leaders that even the lay figures of the party no longer attempt to conceal the fact. In the mat-ter of reconstruction, Tran. Streams is a gonized at the thought that barely four weeks remain in-which to perfect some method of restoration that will restore the waning unanimity of the party. Besten both last session and this in his own while restore the wanning unanimity of the party.

Ho-understands that, unless something is effected and put forth definitely to the world, his leaderfailure, and his chances of maintaining such plan or bill devised by any creature of the plan or bin devised by any creature of the commit-tee, and upon which they would make a bold, zeal-ous endorsement. Even this concession, or rather appeal, roused no interest in the committee, which, after a half hour's informal talk, adjourned until Wednesday next. Between Bixeram and Butlers 'old THAD." very sagely concludes that he is go anything like his present mastery over this weak and languid Congress. Bixed's has already fair-ly vanquished him on his own ground in defeating the Enabling Act before the House's week ago, and though the former does not as yet easy to insti-tute any legislation touching reconstruction him-self, yet having held firstrass at bay for the brief residue of the presents easilon, it is sharily proba-ble that he will fail to take the initiative when the stering of the Fortieth Congress results in placing his opponent still further out of the pale of undisputed potency. BUTLER, his wily antagonist, has been here off and a, from the inception of the impeachment move-ent, and has already shaped his ends most adroitly upon one issue at least.

BUTLER and LOGAN may strike hands in this tus-sle to assume the head and front of accusation against Andrew Johnson. Both are positive in indictment shall not be consummated until they are warm in their Congressional seats and prepared to claim all the ectat of the movement, and assume, each for himself, the conduct of the case BUTLER, at this time, is softly taking the Radicals by the hand, with a pleasant grin of protest suffus-ing his distorted, flabby features, and counselling them to put away, as they would the post, all thought of impeachment. "Well enough," says BEN, "when the elections were pending, to keep the ball in motion, but the people being carried. expediency must govern the day." The day that necessitates this assumed expediency will only ast, so far as BUTLER is concerned, until the 4th of March next, and Bourwell and Wilson know er the material for a charge upon which to hinge paign. To-day he has sought BOUTWELL, and sought to draw from that crafty, lynx-eyed Radical done by him and his coadjutor, Wirson, and what degree of success had attended their efforts. As gator evoked during this interview is not likely to improve his understanding of the situation, or en-able him to lay a scheme for foiling the advance ment it really possesses. They have firmly subticipated from the first that a fear of their investigations would have induced the administration to appear before their committee, with a view to examining the evidence of the accusation, and for the presentment of rebutting witnesses.
