to atoms. Every avenue of escape was choked by debris, and he was buried alive. Lighted a lamp, which he fortunately found unbroken, he looked about him. The two attendants were missing, the other found crushed to death. After a period of despair the prisoner set to work with the energy of desperation, to dig out; but the walls crumbled continually, and each brick he took away made others fall. His lamp burned out, but he toiled in darkness. After working two days, the ceiling fell in, stunning him. Recovering consciousness at length, he saw above him the stars. It was night, but he was alive and nearly free. Next morning he made his escape, and crouching by his ruined house, wept for more than two hours. In his week's entombment, his hair had grown white, and he had aged more than in twenty years.

The State Fair at Columbia.

The energetic officers of the State Agricultural Society, with the active co-operation of the citizens of Columbia, are working very hard to make the State Fair, which opens to-morrow, a handsome exposition of the manufactures and the agricultural and industrial enterprise of the whole State. A large sum of money has been spent in improving the Fair Grounds, and Columbia seems determined to show all South Carolina that the capital, oppressed as it is by the presence of the head-centres of Radical rascality, has life enough and energy enough to gather the people together in the good cause of industrial progress, and is able, besides, to take good care of the throng of visitors who are already filling the hotels from basement to roof. A number of private families have sent in their names to the committees as ready to receive visitors, and nothing will be left undone to secure the comfort of the thousands who will be attracted to Columbia by the meeting of the Survivors' Association (when General Preston will deliver an oration) and by the ball of the South Carolina Club, as well as by the Great Fair itself.

We trust that every county in South Carolina will be represented in the Fair. It was hoped that an arrangement might have been made for holding the fairs in alternate years in Charleston and Columbia. But if this cannot be, we of the seaboard must stand by Columbia, as Columbia, we are sure, when the time comes, will stand by us.

New Publications.

MARGARET: A Tale of the Real and the Ideal. Blight and Bloom. By Sylvester Judd. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

We hope we shall not be thought uncharitable when we say that the author of this book appears to us to be crazy. It is the only hypothesis by which we can account for the mass of incoherent jargon which comes to us with the magniloquent title above quoted. It is impossible to disentangle the slender thread of story from the heterogeneous collection of sesquipedalian words "which stagger under their own weight" through the four hundred closely printed pages. We shall not, therefore, attempt the hopeless task, but will content ourselves with indicating a few of the leading features of this wonderful production.

"Margaret," the heroine, is first introduced to us "phantasmagorically," as the author puts it, an infant, playing in the grass near its parents' cottage, in New England; and, in the first chapter, we have one or two suggestions of what is really the only merit we have been able to discover in Mr. Judd's writing—a certain sympathy with outward nature which shows itself, every now and then, in bits of fresh and vivid description.

The rest of the book is comprised under the ostensible divisions of Margaret's youth and womanhood, and, except that it grows more unintelligible, as "the Real and the Ideal," "Blight and Bloom" alternately predominate in the heroine's development, does not differ much from its opening promise. Here is a specimen, taken at random, of the ordinary conversation of one of Margaret's friends, Master Elliman:

"Those super-audicular capillary appendages, hardened with pomatum, to what shall we liken them, or with what similitude shall we set them forth? They are like the eaves of a Chinese temple, or, in the vernacular of your brother, Nimrod, they are like a sheep's tail; yea, verily. But by a paradox, if est, by digressing and returning, we will keep in the straight track. The deacon, the parson and the master, a megasophistical triad, have recommended Hale's Spelling Book. Enoch was a pupil of mine, and, though grown sanctimonious of late, he always knew how to say the right thing, as his book abundantly teaches. Webster, moreover, advertises us that it is no letter; the goal of every breathless, whip-fearing, abed-alarid valorous strife, the high-sounding Ampernyand no letter! Hebercule! You appreciate that from the alphabet, and Deacon Hadlock will appreciate you from the school; yea, verily."

The author informs us, in the preface, that "Master Elliman has been called a sort of 'diluted imitation of Dominie Sampson.'" Shade of the Wizard of the North, turn not back from the spirit land to avenge the desecration! No one but Mr. Judd would ever have dreamed of the comparison.

When Margaret first meets her future lover, which she does in a chapter headed, in strict conformity with the heterogeneousness of the whole book, "Margaret—Mr. Evelyn—Christ," they thus discourse with each other:

"Margaret. 'Am I not an automatic vegetable—a which-huzel-in-coconuts?' The master says I am of the order Bipeds, and in species Siliacianus; distinguished by thirty-two teeth, and having the superior extremities terminated by a hand, which is susceptible of a greater variety of motions than that of any other animal, and is remarkably prehensile, &c., &c. For my own part, I incline to the syrian analogy, only my clothes are not half so durable as this bark, nor my hair so becoming as the leaves, and I must undress myself at night, and take to my bed, while the trees sleep standing and unhooded. Then, what a pother we make about eating, while the tree lives on its own breath, and, easier than a duck, muddles for nourishment with its roots."

than before. We are informed by her husband, about this time, that "I never could have imagined so perfect an incarnation of 'Christ as she is!' and, a little further on, 'She has perhaps more philosophy than a philosopher; and, if, as has been observed, 'history be philosophy teaching by example, 'Nature is Margaret, teaching by practice. 'She also possesses much of the Universal 'Heart.'" In this remarkable condition we gladly leave her. She is evidently quite beyond the reach of criticism, and has "outsoared the shadow of our night!" to an extent which makes it quite impossible for us to follow her.

In one of the critical notices which the publishers have kindly affixed to the book as a guide to our judgment, we are told that "Margaret will be one of the antiquary's 'text-books.'" It may be so, and, until that time shall come, we deposit it in undisturbed rest upon our highest shelf.
