Saturday, June 10, 1871, will be memorable on account of a snow storm of an hour's duration at Birmingham, England.

In portions of Louisiana white laborers are said to be cultivating cotton and sugar with no sickness beyond the average among the negroes.

Mrs. Woodhull is reported to have said, speaking of woman's suffrage: "Next year I shall be elected President of the United States, and they will see the strength of this movement."

As I said to the President last year, when I was in Washington, "Ulysses, I said—I call him Ulysses, as we are very old friends; we grew up together—Ulysses, said I, you ought to have taken a strong position on the 'fourteenth amendment in favor of female suffrage, the same as you have in favor of negro suffrage on the fifteenth amendment."

Dr. Bruhl, a Cincinnati physician, politician and newspaper correspondent, visited Laura Fair, the tree-love murderer, in her prison in San Francisco, and describes her as an affected, vain, unfeeling woman, with a disagreeable voice.

The approaching public anniversary of Pio Nono, which is looked forward to with so much interest by all the Catholics of the world, and by none with greater interest than by the Catholics of America, reminds every one of how few of the Popes have reached the immense age vouchsafed to Kings like George III or Louis XIV.

The last of the many foundations with which New Orleans seems destined to be perpetually afflicted, involved the loss of about a million dollars' worth of property, and much personal discomfort and actual suffering.

would be avoided, and the prejudice of the Alsatians against anything Prussian, even in name, respected. In regard to subsequent measures, Bismarck declared that the wishes of the population should first of all be consulted, and to this end the Communal elections, postponed last August, should be ordered. This should be followed by an election of consuls general according to the old French law, and as liberal a degree of autonomy as is compatible with the security of the whole country should be conceded. Having delineated this policy, Bismarck turned his attention to two amendments of the bill, to which he objected on account of the apparent lack of confidence in the government which they indicated. The first shortens the duration of the dictatorship and its peculiar powers; the second limits its financial powers and privileges. He protested that all he desired was time enough to carry the whole enterprise to completion, and that he had no itching for power, in itself considered. "I am not a man of a necessity for power to govern." And with considerable threat he threatened to resign unless the financial relations of the government and the provincial relations were settled, with the understanding that he would be satisfied with the means of paying for all present wants had been satisfactorily provided, and that Alsace was free from debt.

"The Battle of Dorking."

The opening article in Blackwood's Magazine for May: "The Battle of Dorking—Reminiscences of a Volunteer" has been read by tens of thousands on both sides of the Atlantic. In this country all who have admired the finely painted picture—pre-Raphaelite, almost to painfulness. The Englishman, however, has read it with far deeper interest. To him it is the sound of the death-knell of Albion. The writer of his magazine article (Colonel Hamley, it is believed), using this method to arraign the present British Government for their dilatory policy last summer; for their pusillanimous conduct, now meddling and now proclaiming rigid non-interference; and for their feigned objection of security, when the very air bristles with presages of coming danger. Article after article having been published in the quarters, in the magazines, and in the heavy weeklies on the situation, and on the unprepared condition of England to repel a formidable foreign invasion, and all apparently unheeded—this writer has resorted to a most ingenious method of compelling attention. He has adopted the plan so successfully practiced a century since by Swift, De Foe and Goldsmith, in chronicling imaginary scenes and occurrences, with a minuteness of detail and a realistic accuracy, that beguiled even the most wary into unwilling belief. This old "Volunteer" purports to narrate to his grandchildren, in the year 1925, the conquest of England by the Germans in 1875. After a brief and disastrous struggle, in which he, the narrator, was one of the actors, humbly trying to do his duty to his country, our volunteer, who is withal a grim humorist, tells his long story with the most painfully minute detail, never once smiles, nor betrays his hoax by any blundering anachronism.

With the garrulity of age he bewails the good old times of prosperity; he pictures, in powerful words, the growing strength and unparalleled success of the Prussians, and the imbecility and inefficiency of the party then in power in England, that neglected warning after warning, until the disaster came and found them all unprovided. The crash began, he says, with a rising in India, that drew away a part of the army; then came the difficulty with America, which had been threatening for years, and ten thousand men were sent off to Canada, while a still larger force was in Ireland, to check the rumored Fenian invasion from the West. The fleet, too, was scattered abroad all over the world, and at that very time the Secret Treaty was published, and Holland and Denmark were annexed. At this, the government, egged on by the press and urged by public opinion, declared war.

"It was on a Monday that the declaration of war was announced," says this historian of the future, "and in a few hours we got our first inkling of the sort of preparation the enemy had made for the event which they had really brought about, although the actual declaration was made by us. A 'pious appeal to the God of battles, whom it was said we had aroused, was telegraphed back, and from that moment all communication with the North of Europe was cut off." The usual imbecility of the British Government in urgent times is then exemplified; for the golden opportunities of the first few days are lost, and it is not until the Tuesday, twilight following the declaration of war that the fleet, the main dependence of the nation, sets out for the North Sea. It was the 10th of August, 1875, that the fleet left the Downs, the admiral paying out a submarine cable as it advanced, so that communications might be kept up. On Thursday morning the wildest excitement was created by the announcement, through the cable, that the enemy's fleet were in sight. Shortly after that the action had begun; then came the first token of calamity—the news that an iron-clad had been blown up; then that the enemy's torpedoes were doing great damage; that the flag-ship had been blown up; and then—terrible silence for two days, when a solitary iron-clad, that had escaped the disaster, steamed into Portsmouth, and gave the details of the destruction of all the vessels of the fleet save one. From her commander and crew it was learned that the English had attempted to close with the enemy, who, "heered off, and left behind them the terrible engines that had sent their ships, one after another, to the bottom. The government, it was afterwards found out, had received warnings of this invention, but had treated them with indifference. The blow fell upon the nation utterly unawares. The panic was terrible; the funds went down to 35; the Bank of England stopped; half the firms in the city fell. The people flocked to arms, but the stock of rifles was deficient. A lot of smooth-bore muskets were distributed from the Tower, but there was no smooth-bore ammunition in the country.

There is a close parody, all through this article, of the history of the late war between France and Germany. England is supposed to have been surprised into a big war with Germany, confident, as France was, of sure and speedy victory, but in reality not a whit better prepared for such a struggle, neither as to her army or her navy. He describes the tumult and confusion, the blunders and the sufferings, incident to the "mobilization" of the volunteers, the absence of efficiency in all departments, the ignorance, both of officers and men, of the requirements of a military life, with a faithfulness, brought home to us, as we saw every part of it enacted in the first year of our late civil war; the military enthusiasm that pervaded this city when the three or four regiments came down from the up-country, just before the bombardment of Sumter, in April, 1861—all the boys fresh in health, buoyant in spirits, comfortably clad, and brimful of martial ardor, restively chafing at compulsory inaction. But the cruel reality demolished all our anticipations of speedy victory. All this again happened at Dorking, where the Germans landed and knocked the English into smithereens. Those of our officers who brought their best broadcloth, fine linen, &c., &c., along in trunks, in case they should wish to go into society, and lay by the soldier for an hour or so, and of course at the very first march lost "store" clothes, trunks and all, may find a satisfaction in the fact that at Dorking the very same thing happened to the unfortunate volunteers. The author must have witnessed the opening of the late struggle in France, else we do not see how he could have thought of all these little things—unimportant in themselves, but serving to make a perfect picture.

Their German conquerors gave them credit for brave fighting and good shooting. "But," says the German, "they are nothing 'at the drill; if they had been as good at 'drilling as at shooting, we should not be 'here now.' "Discipline," says another—"for that of course is what they meant by drilling—'makes the good soldier.'"

The battle is admirably painted, and the sufferings of the wounded, and then, when all is over, the feeling of degradation of the Briton in presence of an overbearing foreign conqueror. "Think," says the volunteer to his grandson, fifty years after, "what those endured, who, like myself, had 'been citizens of the proudest nation on earth, which had never known disgrace or defeat, and whose boast it used to be that 'they bore a flag on which the sun never set.' We had heard of generosity in war; 'we found none; the war was made by us; 'it was said, and we must take the consequences. London and our only arsenal (Woolwich) captured, we were at the mercy of our captors, and right heavily 'did they tread on our necks. Need I tell 'you the rest? of the ransom we had to pay, 'and the taxes raised to cover it, which 'keep us paupers to this day?'

"What was there left to us to live for? 'Stripped of our colonies; Canada and the 'West Indies gone to America; Australia 'forced to separate; India lost forever, after 'the English there had all been destroyed, 'vainly trying to hold the country when cut 'off from and by their countrymen; Gibraltar and Malta ceded to the new naval 'power (Germany); Ireland independent, 'and in perpetual anarchy and revolution. 'When I look upon my country as it is 'now—its trade gone, its factories silent, its 'harbors empty, a prey to pauperism and 'decay,' &c., &c. 'France was different; war 'could not take away their rich soil; they 'had no colonies to lose; their broad lands, 'which made their wealth, remained to 'them, and they rose again from the blow.'"

The design of the writer would appear to have been two-fold: a timely warning to his countrymen, and also a rebuke against the course of the Germans, and their treatment of the French. The whole article abounds in good and quotable things, but our limits forbid further indulgence.

The Profane Major.

A valued correspondent suggests that Major Samuel Dickerson ought, in changing his company, to mend his manners. His recent harangues, at the ward meetings of citizens, however well meant in their general drift, were blasphemous and vulgar to a degree. The major probably forgot himself, and fancied that he was in a Military Hall caucus, or in the City Council. We hope he will do better in future.
