[From the Chicago Times.]

The most colossal surgical operation ever The most colossal surgical operation ever performed upon a living creature was witnessed by a select few in this city on Tuesday, June 4. The elephant Romeo, of Forepaugh's menagerie and circus, was the subject. It appears that at the opening of the present season Romeo was more than usually intractable, and was accordingly chained up. He tugged at the chains until they entered deeper and deeper into his flesh, and the wounds and deeper into his flesh, and the wounds afterward festered and inflamed so that he afterward festered and inflamed so that he could scarcely walk. Having two weeks to stay in Chicago. Mr. Forepaugh determined to place Romeo in the hands of a surgeon. With this purpose in view he called on Dr. H. W. Boyd, professor of surgery and anatomy of the Chicago Medical College, who has had some experience in elephantine surgery, having dissected to or three of these monsters, and who is now engaged in setting up the great who is now engaged in setting up the great carcass of the famous Hannical in the museum of the college. The professor consented, and, accompanied by Mr. R. J. Withers, a veterinary surgeon, mace his appearance at the menagerie.

THE SURGEONS BEGINNING THEIR WORK. HE SURGEONS BEGINNING THEIR WORK.

Having got Romeo in proper position, the surgeons opened their tool chest, and lighting a brisk fire in a furnace secured for the occasion, rolled up their sleeves and literally "went in." One of the Forepaugh brothers, who has sharge of the elephants, placed himself in front of Romeo with a pitchiork; a nimble darkey, assistant keeper, took charge of his trunk by attaching several handspikes to it; Dr. Whithers kneit before his victim, and in another moment several pounds of eleit; Dr. Whithers kneit before his victim, and in another moment several pounds of eichbabt steak were severed from the mass. Simultaneously a low rumbling like distant thunder vibrated through the tent, bringing every animal in the menagerie to the chorus, and for a minute or two it seemed as 'f all the elephants had broken loose in Pandemonium. Romeo was the first to recover his presence, being assisted in his task by many well-directed and pointed arguments.

The next thrust brought only a quiver over the huge carcass, and after that, during three mortal hours of terrible pain, the animal displayed only the noblest qualities of fortifude. The surroundings of the animal soon presented the appearance of an ill-ordered TUNNELLING A MOUNTAIN OF FLESH. Again and again, under the direction of Prof. Bond, Br. Withers cut, gouged, tunnelled and chiselled into the poor beast, each time cuttling away or digging out a pound or two of putrid fiesh, and each time the knife or other tool was withdrawn the blood flowed coplously after it. Like a practiced miner, the doctor only prospected for a while, feeling his way to the crevices. Soon he laid bare a member, and then entered upon a task that sickened the stoutest saw-bones present. Havsinkened the stoutest saw-bones present. Having exposed the seats of corruption he bagan to scoop them out, pringing handful after handful to the surface. Tunnelling his way along by means of scrapers and chisele, his arm would enter the animals leg to the elbow, until the sound fiesh was reached. It was not long before the explorer discovered that what sound bone or fiesh there was in Romeo's forelegs wasn't worth speaking about, and the only wonder was that the animal was alive and able to stand on his legs.

AN HOUR UNDER THE KNIFE.

After a full hour spent in slashing, gouging, and scraping, during which the poor beast was rid of fifteen or twenty pounds of putrified matter and flesh, and a pound or two of bone, the surgeons concluded that sufficient for a day might be the evil thereof, and desisted from that part of the operation to enter upon another ten-fold more painful and harrowing. Both legs had been thoroughly tunnelled, and in many cases, where the openings were directly opposite, but slight integuments and fractions of bones prevented a meeting. While these excavations had beer progressing, men were busy at the furnace heating huge soldering trons, several inches in diameter, to a white heat. These were now brought into requisition to remove the proud flesh. AN HOUR UNDER THE KNIFE. BURNING OUT THE PROUD FLESH.

When Dr. Withers approached the animal with the first of these glowing irons, a shiver rankinguish his frame, and he was disposed to resent any further aggression, but being convinced by the pointed arguments of his keeper that it was all for his good, he issued another low thunder, which was echoed from every cage, and straightened his trunk and braced himself for further martyrdom.

The red-bot iron was now run his tunnel every cage, and straightened his trunk and braced himself for further martyrdom.

The red-hot iron was now run into tunnel No. 1 to the length of about a foot, and a hissing r. and, followed by dense volumes of tumes and an intolerable stench. Issued from the opening. The poor brute shook like an aspen, made a slight effort or two at realstance, but soon settled into quietness again. Another red-hot iron was introduced, again there was a quiver of the whole frame, but this time he only drew up his back and changed his position a trifle.

A TUMULT AYONG THE ANIMALS.

The blood now began to flow from the caverns in copious supply, a sight that made all the animals of the cat species desperate, and those, ligers, leopards, hyenas, panthers, wolves, and others of the innumerable horde whose cages formed a circle about the martyr, joined in low growls, which were intensified to roars and shrieks as the funes of the burning flesh filled their nostries. This tumult caused a score or two of keepers to rush for the dens of their pets in their respective charge, and as these added their not over gentle voices to the volume, and the rage of the beauts for the nonce was still further aggravated by endgels and other persuasive things calculated to stir up the animals, the hue and cry was terrific, attracting hundreds of people from the neighborhood, who surrounded the vents, though in momentary fear that a deluge of uncaged wild beasts would come upon them. But against any such catastrophe the strong cages were proof. A TUMULT AMONG THE ANIMALS. FIFTY RED HOT IRONS. .

When the din and noise was somewhat quieted, the operation was proceeded with and during the two following hours above fit, red-hot irons were thrust into the poor brute's carcass. When the surgeons finally desisted it was not because they believed their task completed, but because the caverns had assumed such dimensions that the two-inch irons proved too small to be further effective. Besides, Romeo was evidently weakening and getting a little "groggy" from the loss of three palifuls of blood, Dr. Boyd estimating that he had lost about three palifuls during the operation. The openings were then the oughly washed with lottons, and afterward carefully bound up. The old fellow has always dis displayed a strong predilection for candy and other sweet things. After the operation a nice, big stick was proferred to him, but he refused it with a solemn shake of his head. When the animal's naturally violous temper is taken into consideration, his noble behavior during the painful operations can only be accounted for on the hypothesis that with an n the din and noise was somewhat taken into consideration, his noble behavior during the painful operations can only be accounted for on the hypothesis, that, with an elephant's proverbial sagacity and fine instinct, he was convinced that it would redound to his good. The surgeons expressed strong hopes of his recovery, but he died on Friday.
