

THE BRITISH BEEF QUESTION

The Cattle Plague and the Landholders - A Move Against the Land Laws - Men Without Meat Must Have It.

The subject of keeping up the supply of meat in England has become a matter of political as well as of vital interest, and the agitation as well as of vital interest, and the agitation as well as of vital interest...

On the second meeting of workmen of Birmingham was held on Saturday evening to agitate for a reduction in the price of meat.

Mr. Councilor Whateley, who was called upon to preside, said that the price of meat was to be adopted to lower the price of meat was to be adopted to lower the price of meat...

Mr. Councilor Whateley, who was called upon to preside, said that the price of meat was to be adopted to lower the price of meat was to be adopted to lower the price of meat...

The cry for closing the ports which had been raised by the conservatives and landed interest, and said that when mixed cargoes arrived they ought to destroy the cattle which were diseased and sent to the healthy for their meat.

Mr. Beech, of West Bromwich, in seconding the motion, commended the landholders for depriving the people of their greatest enjoyment in sitting down to their leg of mutton or round of beef, and then graphically depicted the slavish tone of the rollers, engineers and paddlers of the Black Country, who were carrying off them, while ten thousand of them had never seen a morsel of meat in their lives.

Mr. Adams supported the motion, earnestly denying the imputation which had been made, that those who had got up this agitation were getting any profit out of it.

Mr. Dalzell rose to propose the second resolution, saying they must have free trade in land: there were 30,000 men who had almost the whole of the land of the country.

The New York Iron Steam Line - Information has reached here that the spacious and elegant steamship Georgia left New York for this port at 8.15 P. M. yesterday, having on board one of the largest freights ever sent South.

The Marion Crescent, of the 28th instant, says: "We regret to give an unfavorable account of the crops this year. The rubber has injured cotton very seriously in the South, except, perhaps in the lower portion, from which we have no late accounts."
