In dealing with capital its policy is diplomacy, not war. It negotiates with manufacturers and freighters, rather than fight them. After it has a large accumulated capital, it may make itself felt in the construction and control of those great trunk freight railways which, first proposed some mouths ago by the Harald, are now so argently demanded by our leading business men as the necessary conduits through which the life-giving currents of trade may circulate in all the length and breadth of the land, North and South, East and West, connecting all sections with each, like the arteries in the human body. By association it would relieve the farmer from the effects of isolation and dependence upon others who live at ease on the results of his toil.
