FRANCE AND GERMANY.—The Paris correspondent of the London Standard, one of the best informed writers on French affairs in the English press, asks: "Can any man of average common sense believe that Germany will quietly rest on her oars and wait until France has completed the organization which will bring her fighting strength to upwards of 1,000,000 men?"

As it to confirm the views of this correspondent, we are told that in Madrid a movement is on foot to offer the crown of Spain to Prince Leopold, of Hohenzollern. The head of this movement is Sagasta, one of the ablest men in Spain.

As it to confirm the views of this correspondent, we are told that in Madrid a movement is on foot to offer the crown of Spain to Prince Leopold, of Hohenzollern. The head of this movement is Sagasta, one of the ablest men in Spain. This is the same Prince to whom the crown was offered by Prim, in 1870. We know all the consequences that came after. As matters now stand, France would probably submit in silence to the acceptance of the crown by a Hohenzollern. But at the same time nothing would be more galling to the French pride or more opposed to the traditions of all French governments.

The French feel about a German prince in Spain as we felt when Maximilian was in Mexico, or rather as we would feel if the Queen were to send an English prince to rule there. The advantage to Germany of such a candidature would be great. Belgium and Italy are now allies of Germany. England is under treaty bonds to protect Belgium from France. This makes England virtually an ally, because Belgium is the only way by which France could enter Germany.

With Spain in the hands of a German prince, in the event of a war, 200,000 Spaniards could be swept through the passes of Perpignan and St. Jean de Luz to menace Bordeaux and Marseilles and ravage the Southern provinces, which even Moltke's armies did not touch. So that a German prince on the throne of Spain virtually hems France as by a wall.

The Hohenzollern story may be a speculation after all. It seems to us that if the nineteenth century has any civilization, it could find a way to make peace between two nations as grand and powerful and useful as Germany and France. Why is it that this war spectre should forever haunt the banks of the Rhine? For 2,000 years the banks of that beautiful river have been laved with the blood of contending armies, and peace was never further from the hills and vineyards of Rhineland than now. The Germans seem to seek peace in emigration. But it is a sad commentary upon the greatness and freedom of Germany that its people can only find peace in exile.
