

London, August 4. In the House of Commons, today, Mr. Beecher, Under-Secretary for the Foreign Department, in answer to an inquiry from Sir George Bowyer, stated that her Majesty's Government had no intention of taking part in an armed intervention in Spain, and had no reason to suppose that other European powers contemplated any such step, which would not meet with encouragement from England.

The report that Germany had sent a note to France, protesting against the violation of the Spanish frontier and threatening intervention, is pronounced to be without foundation.

might be perfectly transparent to my husband with respect to my interview with Mr. Beecher, else, I used to charge my mind with our conversations and repeat them to Mr. Tilton.

Mrs. Tilton continues: She was continually questioned by Tilton concerning these conversations in a most jealous manner. She was afterwards told with anger that she concealed something that she didn't mean to tell; that she lied for three years. She tried to repeat everything that was said, but found Tilton more suspicious than ever; he had no confidence in her, and she suffered a great deal.

This state of things lasted to the present day, although she had not felt so badly the last two years. Tilton's criticisms to her took the form of accusations in the winter of 1869, when he began to assume she had done a criminal wrong with Beecher.

She met the charges sometimes with anger, sometimes with calmness or silence, but invariably denied criminal intimacy. She had denied it in letters to Tilton, but they were lost. He seemed to use all his influence to make her acknowledge the wrong, and talked so much of it, she thought he was morbid.

He told her once that he saw her sitting on Beecher's lip, in our parlour, and she replied, "You didn't!" This morbid jealousy had a wearing and sickening effect on her; he never named any definite time or place of any criminal act with Beecher, and never pretended she was guilty of any impropriety at Beecher's house.

She went there twice or thrice to consult with Beecher about a sick person; she never met him at any other place by appointment. Tilton never accused her of criminality based upon any admission by her; it was not true she confessed in July, 1870, any act of impropriety with Beecher.
