And this economic ruler does not covet soil merely to count to many acres. That plan does not meet his approbation. He follows the soldier with the merchant, the cannon by the steamboat, the rife and the sword by the railroad and the locomotive. A railroad is now under construction between Cairo and Khartoum. It will be continued to Darfur. It may even be extended to Gondokoro and the Lake Albert Nyanza. It undoubtedly will be, if the Khedive is allowed to carry out his ambitious designs. The road will be located in the valley of the Nile, and its cost not excessive. From Cairo to Khartoum, the whole expense is estimated at $1,400,000. A branch line is also in contemporation to run from Khartoum. toum, the whole expense is estimated at $1,400,000. As a trade movement, this furnishes abundant evidence of the this furnishes abundant evidence of the far-sightedness of the present ruler of Egypt. When this road is completed, he can command and monopolize the whole trade of the long and fertile valley of the Nile, and pour the profits into his treasury. Forty centuries will gaze with wonder upon the march of modern divilization by the stony sphinx, and the shrill scream of the locomotive will almost reach the ears of the ancient Pharoahs as they lie unshrouded in Pharoahs as they lie unshrouded in countless folds beneath the mighty and beneath the present is enduring pyramids. But the present is the motive power, and the past can only wonder in silence. Besides the comwonder in silence. Besides the com-hercial and trade aspect of this move-ment, it has another of startling im-port—concealed, it is true, but name the less perceptible to those who have watched the course of the Khedive for some years. If Abyssinia were annexed to Egypt, he would command the whole Western coast of the Red Sea, as he now, in reality does, the Suez Canal. A few years ago, an Egyptian army started in the direction of Abyssinia. It was halted before the boundary was reached, for before the boundary was reached, for fear of a difficulty with England.
