AN OHIO CASABIANCA.—Rome, Ohio, has a genuine Casabianca. One day recently a farmer placed his boy, a youth of twelve, to guard a certain point where they had been "fighting fire," which was passing through the woods. The little fellow did not return home at the time expected, and search was made for him, though he was not found until the morning of the following day, when his body was discovered burnt to a crisp. It is not known how the boy came to perish in the flames, but the belief is that his regard for his father's command was so great as to induce him to face the fire until escape was out of the question. If this theory be the correct one, the boy should have a monument, and a high one. Young America, it must be regretfully admitted, does not supply much of the material for Casabiancas, and a case so exceptional as that of the Ohio boy should be made much of, as showing that such a thing as filial regard still exists.

TAKING THE CENSUS.—Mrs. Sullivan's dislike to the census takers brought her into trouble. She thought she had a right to have as many children as she pleased without being bothered by inquisitive people wanting to know her age, condition and other personal matters. Looking on her house as her castle, she cast forth the census taker, book, ink-stand and all, and for this assertion of her independence, an illiberal and tyrannical magistrate fined her three dollars—and we boast of our individual liberty!
