THE BATTLE OF KING'S MOUNTAIN : OR THE HERO'S REVENGE.

A TALE OF WHIG AND TORY WARFARE. Do you remember this day? It is the 7th of October, 1780, nearly two months after the defeat of General Gates, and after the annihilation of Sumter. Reader of the richest history in the world-the history of your own Revolution -can you have forgotten it? Has it been buried in oblivious silence beneath accumulations of more pompous events? Have its lurid battlements been eclipsed by the meteoric splendor, the glare of more gorgeous victories? Or has the muse of a continent yet found no son, who would stoop to sing the stormy deeds of hunters fighting without a flag, fed on parched corn and receiving no pay but the golden coin of conscience, and the promise of their country's good?

See! yonder on King's Mountain, a table eminence, with a level at the summit, six hundred yards long, by sixty wide, lies the camp of Ferguson—a hollow parallelogram of scarlet uniforms, black muskets, and sharp bristling steel. The drum rolls. The red cross flies.— The acclinities are defended by monstrous Titans of dark rocks. Veterans hardened in the fires of a dozen campaigns, stand on the mountain's top. It is "King's Mountain" too! Who shall think of storming its steep sides!

We shall see presently.

Look! three parties are climbing over the rocks ascending those old walls of nature's handiwork, built dim, distant centuries ago, perhaps in the morning of creation. One moves to assault the west end, another to the east while the third will charge the centre. Is it not a brave sight? But you cannot see them very well, for a veil of mist shrouds the mountain, through which the eye of the sun peers pale, as if sick at the carriage about to be.

The approach of freedom's warriors is covered by the thin mist and thick trees, and even now the black rocks aid them. Suddenly on the three sides of the steel and iron parallelo-gram, nine hundred rifles roar, and nine hun-dred shouts rise; and then a thousand English muskets answer back with hoarse thunders of Ferguson is not-cannot be surprised. With furious calmness he attacks the assailants with fixed bayonets, and forces them to retire. But they only give a little, and instantly renew the combat. Every massy rock becomes a battery—every pine tree burns powder. The marks men of the backwoods hold their bullets in their mouths for swift reloading, and thus the torrent of fire never censes. The officers on both sides fight like common soldiers. It is more a wholesale murder than a battle by rule.

But tell me—who are those two standing foremost among the Tennesseeans on the western edge of the mountain top, disdaining shelter, refusing to yield an inch of ground, defiant of all Britain's bayonets! Do you know them -the old man-how dark is his silver hair with war's sable smoke- how dim looks the white paper on the black gun's muzzle; heaven! how beautifully it blazes now, as death rings a tory's or a tyrant's funeral in every peal-with that bold grandson still, as ever, beside him! His eyes flashed destructive joy, the matchless ec stacy of the battle; and yet he is not satisfied. He groans: "Oh! God of justice, where is Mary's murderer? Shall I not find-shall any other hand than mine slay him ?"

Now look on the other side of the mountain You behold a giant of evil aspect in fiery red hair. He leads a company of tory riflemen .-They too are mountaineers, and do execution as fearful as the brother foeman of their own land, who struggle for it and liberty. That captain is Tom Bell—the robber before the war, and since the murderer of Mary. Let hiur not cross the black muzzle fleeked with its snowy paper!

Still on goes the bloody work. Columns repentedly charge and break-form and charge again. Campbell, Cleveland, Sevier, Shelby, and the gallant Lacy, rule America's tide of war, bursting up the mountain's clifted side.— Ferguson's blue eye shines like a star, and Tom Bell's red face burns like a comet, above the surging sea of red coats.

At length there comes a turn, Ferguson shapes a huge wedge-like column of solid, gleaming, blood-dripping bayonets, and slowly pushes the Americans in the eastern foot of the eminence.

Is all then lost? No. See a terrible band of the good and true from the canebrakes of French Broad, four hundred miles away over the Alleghanies, have moved round the mountain from the west. They are headed by the rifle with the white paper on its muzzle, and they discharge a cataract of flame into the British flank. Look now, how the scarlet uniforms roll backwards up the acclivity, faster than they came, leaving many a red cross behind them.

See again—the freshmen having learned how to charge, too, without bayonets. They charge in condensed columns, with fire and hot lead, and drive the slaves down the western slope in disorder to the deep base. Then the breeze springs up and clears the mountain of it mist and battle smoke, and the broad sun of heaven smiles on the living and the dead.

As a last resort, the brave Ferguson forms his entire force into columns, to cut his way out of tat awful circle of fire. He flings his sword wildly on ligh. He shouts in thunder, "Forward-charge!" The next instant he is a corpse. A rifleball from the muzzle wreathed with snowy paper, has gone through his heart. The British, panic-stricken, throw down their arms and cry for quarter. A number equal to the whole American army are prisoners. And now the old man raises a yell, that sounds above the pean-shout of nine hundred strong throats-"King's mountain is ours forever !"

Thus terminated gloriously, an engagement in many respects the most important, waged during the war. It struck the savages of the frontier with terror from Ohio to Florida. It laid in the dust Britain's grand schemea of Tory co-operation. Lord Cornwallis heard of it paused in his triumphant career, and ordered a hasty retreat to Winnsborough, eighty miles in his rear. Marion and Sumter heard of it, and renewed their deadly ambuscades.

The battle shock, was over; the battle-smoke drifted away on the wind, and the sun shone brightly on the dead and dying-on broken arms and bleeding bosoms-when a jury-martial sat to decide a question of avenging justice. The atrocious Tories were summarily arraigned to answer the charge of fifty murders.

"Do you remember French Broad, and the 16th of August?"

"Save me from him!" cried the Tory captain, stretching forth his chained hands for help to the astonished bystanders.

"Have you forgotten Mary Copeland?" asked the old man, grinding his toothless gums till the blood ran out on the foam of his lips.

"I did not kill her-oh! you cannot say I killed her?" exclaimed the coward, falling on his knees, and seeking to embrace the feet of his enemy.

" No-But you forced her to kill herself, as the sole means of salvation from foul dishonor?" "Oh! I did not intend to harm her!" persisted the false Tory, writhing in the dust like the meanest of reptiles. "Then rise and swear," answered the other with a grim smile.

The wretch sprang up and pledged oaths wild enough to wake the dead.

"Do you see this dagger?" inquired the aged hero pointing to a silver hilt glittering in his

"Mercy! Mercy!" shrieked the murderer. The eyes of the old man shot sparks of living fire, as he said in a hoarse, hissing whisper—

"This dagger, on the night of the 16th of August, was in the heart of an angel. But now it is in yours, devil," he added, striking home the sharp steel with a motion prompt and powful like lightning.

There was a moan, and then a gurgle, and then a gush of warm blood; and the victim lay a corpse at the avenger's feet.

Five minutes afterwards nine others-equal traitors and homicides—hung dangling from the swinging limbs of oak and pine tees, there on the summit of King's Monntain, which no King should again call his own, any more for-
