Wonderful Musical Invention. One of the most extraordinary musical inventions ever conceived by the human mind, will shortly be submitted to the public of Philadelphia, at the Musical Fund Hall. -The idea was conceived by Mr. Anthony Faas, the maker of the celebrated American Accordeon, which attracted so much attention at the annual exhibitions of the Franklin Institute, for which he received two silver medals. The musical invention, which will shortly be introduced to a Philadelphia audience, consists of nine automata, as large as life. There are two flute players, one clarionette player, two trumpets, three bass horn players, and a bass drummer.—The figures are dressed in the Tyrolesian costume, and present quite a natural and imposing appearance. By pulling a slender wire the instruments are partly raised and the heads of the figures drop forward in the most natural manner The machinery of course is complicated. and of immense power. The music is excellent, and one can scarcely realize that the figures are not human beings. The drummer, in beating time, does his part to perfection. Marches, polkas, walzes, patriotic tunes, and opera pieces, can be per-formed with remarkable precision and sweetness of tone. Mr. Faas has bestowed ten years labor on this work. He, of course, labored under the greatest difficulties. Even the drummer, that would seem to be the easiest made, caused him three years of almost undivided attention.

When Maclzell's automaton chess player and automaton trumpeter were introduced to the citizens, they created an immense sensation. The encomiums then passed were fully deserved; but how much more interesting and ingenious is it to array nine, with a variety of instruments and to make them play so well that some of the bands of musicians of our city might blush. Mr. Faas never permitted any one outside his own domestic household to know what he was doing. He was an object of suspicion to some of the police. They had seen accordeon valves lying about his house, at different times, and they conceived the idea that these were unstamped German silver counterfeit quarters and they watched close.

The unsuspecting ingenious gentleman, who was pursuing his invention under the greatest difficulties, couldn't ride in an omnibus but that an officer would ride in the same vehicle. In conversation with him, attempts were made to find out what he did in a certain room in this house. He never divulged the secret, and this fact alone strengthened the officers' suspicion. All this time, Mr. Faas did not know what they were after. One day he proceeded to Red Bank, New Jersey, for pleasure; so dld an officer. At another time he went to Reading, Pa., on business, and strange as it may seem, an officer whose face was familiar to Mr. Faas, had business there too. As the men of law never could get any evidence that would warrant an arrest, Mr. Faas, of course, remained free. It was not until recently that the secret of the invention became known, and thus the doubts of all have been removed.

Mr. Faas, is one of our most respectable German residents, a man of great skill, ingenuity and goodness of heart, and is highy esteemed by all who have the pleasure of an acquaintance with him. He has already taken the Musical Fund Hall for a limited period, and in a short time our citizens will have an opportunity of looking at and listening to one of the most wonderful musical inventions ever conceived by the mind of man,-Phila. Sun.
