Slowly the great falls of the Niagara River are changing in shape, through the eating away of the shale rock which underlies the hard rock that forms the bed of the rapids. It is almost a misnomer now to speak of the Canadian portion of the great cataract as the "Horseshoe Falls." and within a week this designation has become more than ever misplaced in consequence of the fall of a large section of the bed rock in the very centre of the falls. So much rock fell that an eddy below the falls near the Canadian side of the river has been narrowed more than half, and the little steamer Maid of the Mist difficulty than before in runcurve of the falls.
