

RAISE THE DEAD.

Prof. Poe Has Wonderful Machine

PUMPS IN NEW LIFE.

Medical Men and Other Professional Men Are Greatly Interested in the Model of the New Machine.

Great Things, and Upon Which He Has Experimented.

Almost sightless and semi-paralyzed, Prof. George Poe, living the life of a recluse on a backwoods farm in Norfolk county, Va., claims to have solved the problem of raising the dead by means of his "respirator," as he calls the machine which he has invented for the purpose.

A ten-year-old boy, Arthur Ostrander, son of the man with whom Prof. Poe lives, acted as his assistant in the construction of the machine, which pumps the air of life into the lungs as it pumps out the deadly gases.

The inventor claims that the machine will resuscitate persons killed by asphyxiation, poison or drowning; prevent death by an anesthetic while a patient is being operated upon; prevent "infant asphyxia" at birth; make drunken men sober in a few minutes; revive men electrocuted or hanged, the latter only in cases where the neck has been broken; prevent freezing to death even in the Arctic.

Prof. Poe had long been studying the problem, "When does life really leave the body?" One day, while he was illuminating the centennial of 1879, an employe brought in a trap containing a huge rat.

After the rat had been killed the professor said: "Stand aside, boys, and I'll bring it back to life." He pumped oxygen into its lungs until he actually revived it, so that it leaped from the table and escaped in a hole.

This encouraged Prof. Poe, and he redoubled his efforts to ascertain the exact moment when life ends. His interest in it was stimulated by the fact that a young sister who had been pronounced dead from typhoid fever and placed in her coffin had revived within two hours of the time set for a burial and lived to be the mother of a family.

Several years ago Prof. Poe, stricken with paralysis, was advised by his physicians to live in the country. He went to Norfolk county, and it was while in seclusion on the farm of his friend, A. C. Ostrander, that he evolved his artificial respiration apparatus.

The professor's model is simply that of the human heart. The problem in the case of persons drowned, suffocated or dead through anesthetics was to remove the fluid or the poisonous gases from the stomach or lungs, and at the same time pump life-giving oxygen in.

So Prof. Poe began experiments on what he calls double larynx tubes and two tubes to connect the nostrils - one for inlet. Studying the action of the heart, he saw that it was that of a double cylinder, or rather, of two cylinders; right and left ventricles and right and left auricles.

With the assistance of young Ostrander he built a working model in line with the construction of the heart, a simple machine with two cylinders, each having an inlet and an outlet valve. The plungers of each cylinder are made to work simultaneously.

The machine will in a very few minutes sober up a drunken man who has fallen into a stupor. It is the slow respiration caused by liquor that makes a man "drunk."

By the help of the respirator the respiration would be quickened and the point thus carried out of his system, mind and body once more resume their normal state.

Thomas Black, a retired business man of Norfolk, on being shown the plans obtained permission to exhibit them to Dr. Francis M. Morgan, a physician of Norfolk. Dr. Morgan immediately saw that it promised to be an immense boon to humanity, and he induced the professor to demonstrate it before a committee of Norfolk county and Norfolk city doctors.

Mr. Brunson Compares the Old and New Dispensary Laws.

He Does Not See Where the Prohibitionists Have Gained Anything By New Law.

To the Editor of The State: I do not wish you to think that prohibition is dead, or that I am disgruntled at defeat. The truth is, while I do not intend to again be a candidate for any office, I shall continue to vigorously oppose the sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, and with this in view shall lend a hand to the organization of the prohibition forces during the next two years.

The prohibitionists were chiefly responsible for the enactment of the old dispensary law and true to their compromising tendencies they deserve, in large measure, the credit for the passage of the new dispensary law.

Will not the county dispensaries, now being so eagerly established sell just as much liquor as when they were under State control? Will not the stuff now sold by them make just as much drunkenness and crime as the stuff they sold before? Have not the opportunities for corruption and graft been multiplied by the number of new county boards authorized to buy liquors?
