Fall Season of 1910

Conditions Give Great Promises.

The cloud of gloom which seemed to settle over this country as a result of conditions brought about by the backward spring, is lifting and the sun of prosperity is seen shining by many who were disposed to be pessimistic, at least doubtful, about the immediate future. This change is due in the main to the crop prospects which are much better than the most sanguine a few weeks ago could hope for:

even a bumper yield in the chief crop-corn. The South is, of course, dependent on cotton for its prosperity and prospects for this are good. But, even should the yield not come up to expectations, the resultant increase in price would go to make up the difference. And, while the country as a whole is benefited by a big cotton crop, the South has an offset in price when there is a shortage.

in fact, indications now are for more than an average yield in all of the staples, which go to the making of good times in the country, and
