A SHOT IN THE DARK

By CLARA INEZ DEACON.

...................... Jack Haines was one of the halfdozen young men who admired Guy Forbes' sister and belonged to the same club as the brother. One after another, these young men had been invited down to "Hazelhurst," which was the country home of the widow Forbes. There were games on the lawnmotoring over the highways-fishing without getting a bite, and various other diversions. And there was Miss Frances, handsome, chatty, witty, and treating all alike.

There was a hoodoo at "Hazlehurst." Seven times in one year it had been robbed.

Of course, Mr. Forbes had bought a gun, and, of course, he had bought another for his sister. They practised until they could hit a barn door a rod away. Each one of the young men that came down brought a weapon.

Two bear traps were set under windows, and wires and alarm bells were to give due notice. The burglar got in just the same. A burglar alarm had been suggested over and over, and finally one was installed. The day it was tested Jack Haines appeared for a three days' visit. "I don't know about it keeping them out," he replied in doubtful tones. "But if you open a door or raise a window it is bound to ring."

He took a trip around the house and returned to the veranda. "There's an outside cellar door that is not wired at all," he said. "How careless of Guy not to to that!" exclaimed the sister. When the brother came home the evening and heard of the derelic tion, he replied: "I was talking with a detective to day."

"Well?" "He advised me to sit up for a few nights and watch and shoot. No burglar gets to work before midnight, and it is daylight at about four at this "And you will sit up in your room?" vas asked.

"Yours truly." "And I in mine," said Mr. Haines. "Where do you think he will get in?" asked Mr. Haines.

"At one of the bedroom windows." "And shall we shoot to kill?" "You bet!"

The girl didn't name the location she would take, but she had it planned Are you mad? Why, that's equal to Firstly, she didn't believe that the price I've been charging my misany burglar would show up that night, or for many another night, either. Secondly, if he did come it would be by the cellar doors. It was the vulnerable point, and he would take no risks in trying experiments. And she a neat little round hole in the sitting laughed to herself over the sort of room rug, where a small amount of watch the two men would keep. They would sit down in rocking chairs, feet up, and pipes a-going, and within half an hour they would be sound asleep to last till morning.

The girl was right in the main, but she missed it in the case of Mr. Haines. Not that he did not fall asleep within the allotted half-hour, but that he pitched to the floor about ers from rheumatism and sciatica have midnight and was very much aroused. No sconer had he got his wits than be cold a plan. He would slip down. he got a plan. He would slip downstairs and turn off the alarm then go out by the back door and thus reach the cellar. When he came back he would pick up some brica-brac to carry to his room until the joke was ready to be exploded.

He had almost reached the door leading into the kitchen when he heard a movement and straightened up. Then came a flash of fire in his face, followed by cries of "Guy! Guy!" and the switching on of electric

"What the devil is the row!" de manded the brother as he came tumbling down stairs.

His sister was crouched against the front door and wringing her hands, and she gasped out in answer:

"I have shot the burglar!" "Where is he?" "There-there-in the dining-room! "Bully for you! I'll have a look at

There was the burglar, lying on his face, and there was a trickle of blood on the parquet floor. He drew up one leg as the other man looked down on

Miss Frances, as she came running in. "Darned if it isn't!"

Mr. Haines opened his eyes and faintly remarked that everything could be explained, and then fainted away and did not come to until the doctor was probing for the bullet When the bustle and hurry were over, the girl told her story.

"I thought I heard the burgiar at that cellar door. Then I was sure I heard him creeping up the cellar stairs and across the kitchen floor. I wanted to scream and run away, but I dared not move. Then the pistol went off by accident. I didn't even must have thought he heard something to bring him down to investi-

"But what in the Old Harry were you doing down here in the dark and All Druggist .- Adv. alone!" was demanded.

"I was waiting for the burglar!" "Well, he came along, and now you are in for a job of nursing. If you don't pul, him through in good shape and ther marry him I hope he'll sue L.
