The kitchen was still stifling hot in spite of the fact that the fire had gone out an hour before, and that a broiling sun was sinking behind the hill.

Virginia set the milk bottles out on the back porch with tickets for the next day's supply. Her cheeks were flushed with the heat, and little moist tendrils of hair clung to her forehead "I don't care how I look," she said as she turned toward the door.

In the double-seated swing, she leaned her head back wearily and closed her eyes. The breeze was cool and refreshing. Tired as she was she began to plan for the morning's work. She had never admitted even to herself, that since John Marshall had been coming to see Annabelle, the
