Dillon is such a good town that folks 'way off would naturally think it was in Robeson county if we did not put some sort of a tag on it. —Robesonian.

THE MAINE BLOWN UP.

Expert Says Explosion That Destroyed the Maine Came From Outside.

New York, July 22.—Lewis Nixon the naval architect who designed the Indiana and Oregon type of battleship, commenting yesterday on the news from the wreck of the Maine, said to a World reporter: "There has never," he said, "been the slightest doubt in my mind about the cause of that vessel's destruction. In the first place, knowing the care with which the magazine of our men-of-war are safeguarded, there was every reason to suppose that unless other powder made under the same condition had been found unstable the explosion was not due to undue heat or powder deterioration.

"In the careful examination made by the very competent board appointed, which met on the light-house, tender Mangrove, a vessel I had built, was most convincing. As the members of the board were personal friends, I talked over the matter afterward with them, especially with Naval Constructor Jno. B. Hoover, U. S. N., with whom I had many opportunities for discussing the question, as he was an inspector at my shipyard for several years.

"When I myself visited the scene of the wreck in Havana Harbor I was struck with the amount of the destruction, and concluded that very probably the magazine was exploded by the firing of the mine, as I rather doubted the possession of a mine capable of such total destruction, though convinced it started from the outside.

"The most convincing fact bearing on the explosion was told me by Capt Stevens, of the Ward liner Havana. He said he was sitting on board the Havana after dinner and was looking directly at the Maine at the time of the explosion. She seemed to rise up forward. Wreckage began to fall on board his vessel. On the deck, one piece very near to him, there fell two very large pieces of cement.

"In our earlier vessels we laid quite a thick layer of cement on the bottom plating in the double bottom so worked as to form water courses to the suction and to cover rivet heads. An explosion from the inside could not well account for the way the vessel was distorted and broken, though it could very naturally add enormously to the destruction, as the vessel's back was broken and she was lifted by the outside explosion.

"There is not much room for controversy. A mine powerful enough might have done all the damage. We shall possibly know what part was played by the ship's explosives.
