DEAR SALLY—I'm a girl of 20, and in my junior year in college. Last spring I dated a boy steadily for several months and wore his fraternity pin. Our romance ended early last fall, and now I'm going with another boy and he's going with another girl. The thing that bothers me now is the fact that I have lost his fraternity pin, and I've been on pins and needles for fear that he will be asking me to return it. What in the world will I do if or when he does inquire about his pin? BETTY COED.

DEAR BETTY COED—Naturally you'll confess that you lost the pin, and offer to reimburse him for it.
NOTE TO BRIDE-ELECT—Certainly, since your parents are dead, your older sister may perform the rite of "giving you away" at your wedding. She enters the church, just as your mother would, immediately before the ceremony begins, seats

DEAR SALLY—The only fault I can find with this lovely girl I'm dating is that she is never ready when I call at her home to pick her up, and by this I mean NEVER ready for at least thirty minutes to as much as an hour. Although I think a lot of her, this tardiness of hers is doing things to me. It's getting more and more nerve-wracking sitting there alone in her living room, especially since no other member of her family ever sits and talks with me and all I can do is just sit and stare at the walls. Do you think maybe I should try to straighten her out on this chronic lack of promptness of hers? ALWAYS WAITING.

DEAR ALWAYS WAITING—Three possible solutions come to my mind. You could bring a book along with you on your next date to help you pass away that inevitable waiting period. Or you would be about thirty minutes later in arriving than the previously-arranged time. Or you could discuss this out-and-out with her, and maybe tell her that the next time you call there's no sign of her after about ten or fifteen minutes you're going to leave and drive around for about thirty minutes before returning. Maybe this will stir her up a bit.

DEAR SALLY—My fiance has had what he thinks is a "brilliant idea." He wants to time the date of our Wedding with a convention his company is sending him on. He thinks this would be an ideal way for us to enjoy an "expenses paid" honeymoon. However, I just don't go for a honeymoon consisting of daily business conferences and nightly cocktail parties. What do you think? BROWNETTE.
DEAR BROWNETTE—I think as you do. However, it's still the inalienable right of any bride to set the wedding date. Pick yours at a different time, and that will
