Hers was the face which launched a thousand ships! She was born Helen, daughter of the King of Sparta, a Greek city-state. When she was grown; Helen was recognized as the most beautiful woman in Greece and her father, selected Menelaus, a warrior-prince, as her husband. But while Menelaus was away at war, Paris, son of Priam, the Trojan King, persuaded her to flee with him to Troy.

Returning, Menelaus and his brother, Agamemnon, raised a mighty army and sailed in a thousand ships to recover his beloved Helen. They laid siege to the heavily fortified city for 10 years and finally decided to build a great wooden horse, while the mystified Trojans watched. The center of the horse was hollow, and when ready, they secreted their finest fighters inside.

The next day, the army was loaded aboard the ships and set sail, leaving the Trojans to believe the siege was lifted. That night, friends inside the city opened the gates and the Trojan Horse was moved in — and Menelaus' heroes took the city.

Paris was killed during the last months of the siege, in 1194 B. C., and Helen married his brother Deiphobus, but she betrayed him and handed him over to Menelaus who killed him. Helen returned to Sparta as Menelaus' wife.
