

Much to be Thankful For.

South Carolina has keenly felt the relatively poor position she has held among the sisterhood of states in such matters as education, good roads and public improvements.

Is it not an honor to have it said of South Carolina that she has:

Fewer divorces than any other state?

It proves conclusively that South Carolinians are on the whole well balanced. They have peace at home.

Is it not an attractive asset to claim greater domestic harmony, fewer "death-ponies" and the necessity of a smaller number of legal mediators than any other state?

Wherefore we may rejoice. By being on the bottom of these tables we are really on top, unless some pessimistic critic should point out the connection between the lack of divorce laws and the scarcity of lawyers.

The state highway commission has decided upon a new rule as to the issuance of demonstration tags. Hereafter such tags will be issued only in the names of the salesman using them at a charge of $2 instead of 50 cents and the salesman will be held responsible for their abuse.

ROAD OF THRILLS

San Diego Short Line Traverses Wild Country.

For Real Beauty Travelers Have Declared There is Nothing on Earth Surpassing It.

"Travelers are urged, and properly so, to see America first, but no person can claim to have fulfilled the admonition," says Editor Howe of the Atchison (Kansas) Globe in a recent issue, "unless he has made a trip over the San Diego Short Line from Yuma, Arizona, to the coast city, the thrill road of this continent. While the road known as the San Diego & Arizona is 220 miles long, only 11 miles is thrill territory. During that 11 miles, it passes through Carrizo mountain gorge, dodging through 17 tunnels which alone were driven at a cost of nearly two millions of dollars, and clinging when out in the open, to a roadbed chiseled from the sides of mountains, with gaping canyons almost straight below you to a distance in places as great as 900 feet. Above the track are sheer and almost perpendicular walls of granite. As the train slips slowly around sharp mountain curves on its shelf, which from a distance looks like a burro trail, one gets as many thrills as are experienced in aviation, but with confidence inspired by the knowledge that he is secured and upon a firm footing through modern railroad construction. The San Diego & Arizona was the only railroad completed during the late war. It was opened in 1919. Its total cost was over eighteen millions of dollars and it is owned jointly by J. D. and A. B. Spreckles and the Southern Pacific. It was built to give San Diego a direct line to the east and before its completion everything moving westward into San Diego or going east from there had to pass through Los Angeles.

"Because of its enormous cost the road doesn't pay, it is said, but it is a great scenic route. The San Diego & Arizona hugs the international boundary closely, crossing and recrossing it a number of times. In fact for 41 miles it is in Old Mexico, but in the peaceful section of Lower California. No passports are required of passengers, and there is no inspection of through baggage. The train stops at several Mexican villages where larger beer signs may be seen from the car windows, but the thirsty must retain their thirst. The train doesn't stop long enough to wet whistles, and, anyway, vestibules are not opened. There is no chance for passengers to leave the train. Persons who have traveled extensively say there is nothing surpassing the scenery in California gorge."

Long Live the Sardine! In Poreguete, a seaport of the Basque provinces of Spain, the people still talk of a certain amusing incident that took place at one time when a large crowd was watching the arrival of the popular king and queen. Suddenly someone shouted "Viva el Rey!" "Viva! Viva!" echoed the crowd in a mighty voice. Then the same fellow shouted, "Viva la Reina!" "Viva! Viva!" came the answering volume from a thousand throats.

At that moment a woman who was selling sardines turned the corner. "Sardines! Vivus sardines!" she shouted. And before the excited throng could restrain itself it had roared forth approvingly, "Viva! Viva!" Youth's Companion.

Forty Years—Or More. Mr. T.—Is past seventy and getting so absent minded that sometimes he passes his best friends and even members of his family. His daughter is the early forties, who is a very progressive business woman, will not permit the family to keep him at home, saying that sons and people don't mind what an old man says.

For the other day she almost fainted, her mother. She was sitting in a room talking to a very attractive young bachelor who had rather worked into the office. He spoke to the man and turned to his daughter. "Your face looks very familiar," he began. "Let's see, how long have I known you in a name? How long have I known you in a name?" The daughter said that her own unexpressed pulse was even more of a giveaway than an answer to the question would have been.
