Brief and to the Point.

A postmaster general or some one in his office at Washington once wrote to the postmaster of some little station on the Tombigbee river: "You will please inform this department how far the Tombigbee river runs up," to which the postmaster answered: "I have the honor to inform the department that the Tombigbee river don't run up at all; it runs down." In due course of mail came another communication: "On receipt of this letter your appointment as postmaster will cease. Mr. ——— has been appointed as your successor," to which went the following reply: "The receipts during the last year have been $437 and the office rent more than double that sum. Please so kindly instruct my successor to pay me the balance and oblige."

Quite a number of "free copies" of the Columbia Record come regularly to Darlington. The labels of all are something like "—Sept 10 b." All subscriptions expire on that date. Some one has suggested that the "b" stands for "Black" or "Bless," or both.—Darlington Press.

The Clemson Agricultural College

The Agricultural and Mechanical College of South Carolina.

This institution is now equipped with courses in Agriculture, Animal Husbandry, and Chemical Industry, Mechanical, Electrical, Civil, Textile, and Metallurgical Engineering. The young men who have graduated from the College are filling positions of trust and the demand for competent engineers and agriculturists is greater than the college can supply.

The next session opens on September 13, 1906. New applicants and students who have work to make up must report promptly on that date. All students of last session who expect to return must also report on the 13th.

It is important for boys who are interested in this Institution to make their applications at once if they desire to enter next session. Each year more applications are made than the College can accommodate. On August 15th, the roll for the session of 1906-07 will be made by assigning to each county the number of students in proportion to the members in the House of Representatives.

For information and catalogue, apply to P. H. MELL, President, Clemson College, S. C.
