NEW GERMAN CHANCELLOR.

Prince Maximilian Does Not Think Like the Kaiser.

The man who more than once was talked about by the German moderates as most likely to succeed in a coup d'etat to replace the kaiser, has been named by William II as imperial chancellor, succeeding Count von Hertling. He is Prince Maximilian of Baden.

The prince is the prospective grand duke of Baden. He is 51 years old. His political confessions of faith revolves around peace by understanding and conciliation. "No conquests" is one of his main principles.

Not long ago he startled Germany by an almost pacifist utterance, urging a "rapprochement" with the Allies, especially England and America.

In Russia his appointment is expected to stir up a hornet's nest among the hitherto pro-German Bolsheviks. For bolshevism is to this prince the greatest menace to civilization, a scourge that must be wiped from the face of the earth. How Berlin will conciliate the appointment of a man holding such views with its peaceful policy toward the reds is problematical.

In political quarters in Washington speculation turns about the question as to whether the kaiser called his would-be rival to the highest office in his giving in order to "put him safe," lest, in the quiet recesses of the grand duchy he continue plotting to seize the Hohenzollern crown.

To be sure, the reports that such have been the prince's ambitions or at least those of his friends and followers have been vague, if persistent, and definite confirmation of these stories is still lacking.

The prince's moderate views, however, and his hatred of bolshevism are fully known.

The new chancellor is likely to make his debut in the reichstag early this week for the parties are reported to have called a plenary session for tomorrow. An important government statement is scheduled for that session and it may contain the announcement of a thoroughly revised foreign policy, perhaps a definite peace offer so clamorously called for by the socialists and other strong parties.—Exchange.

It is claimed that Lithuania, Georgia, has the largest jackass in the State. Now hunt up the list of Georgia's representatives in congress and start a guessing contest.

He Wasn't Idling.

Senator Knute Nelson, of Minnesota, told this story at a dinner party as an illustration of the old saying that appearances are sometimes deceiving:

One afternoon a lady was walking through a suburban village when she noticed a small boy leaning on a gate in front of one of the residences. The boy's attitude did not betray any great amount of ambition.

"I am surprised to see you standing here, my little man," said the woman kindly. "Why do you idle your time on such a beautiful afternoon?"

"I am not idling," defensively declared the boy. "I am working for a thrift stamp."

"Working for a thrift stamp?" wonderingly responded the woman, who couldn't see any signs of labor.

"Yes, ma'am," returned the boy. "Mr. Smith is sitting on the veranda with sister, and he told me that he would give me the price of a stamp if I would watch for father."

phatically that he uses music in his cow barn, and states the A. Field referred to above is evidently some other man.)
