Stand and Deliver.

Robin Hood and his descendants in England were romantic Knights of the road and made it interesting for lonel, wayfaring people traveling the high ways. They rarely attacked other than gentlemen and ladies in their four-in-hand coaches, and their earnings were charitably divided among the poor and distressed. The adventures of these romantic knights are the Christmas reading for our lads and lasses to their admiration, inspiration and edification, Frank M. Brown book-keeper of a Kentucky bank, has skipped with $200 000, the entire assets of the institution.— Alvord, of New York, stole seven hundred thousand from the First National Bank of New York, and is now in ar rest and will soon be wearing stripes in some fashionable House of Detention for such elegant gentlemen. But it Robin Hood and his bold moon-light riders of the centuries back can learn of the beautiful hauls of their modern descendants, how they must envy their glorious opportunities, while they blush that their earnings are gotten without the galantry and heroism anciently attending their vocation. There is even a flavor of romance and heroism in halting a train Jesse James fashion and fighting for a hundred miles through a fighting for a hundred miles through a milderness to hold the booty. But to loot a concern by the tame process of book-keeping should shame the hero of a vuigar midnight burglary.
