WHALE TOWS TWO MEN OUT TO SEA

They Harpoon the Monster But He Refuses to Play the Game as They Figured.

SLAPS CAPTAIN OUT OF BOAT

Valiant Southampton Veterans Have Exciting Time When They Go to Assistance of Brother's Who Had Caught Whale.

Southampton.—For the second time in two weeks fishermen took to their boats and went out after a whale. They had him hooked, too; and if the darn thing hadn't up with its tail and knocked Cap'n Silas Edwards out of the boat just as he was about to spear it, there might even now be a dead whale on the beach.

The whale was sighted by Captain Frank H. White, the sea-bitten old mariner, who tends the life saving station here. When he first saw the whale it was about two miles off shore and moving out to sea with the Cooper brothers from Water Mill.

As a matter of fact the Cooper brothers had caught the whale. The only trouble was that, having caught it, they didn't know what to do with it.

It was some time earlier in the day that the Cooper brothers had seen the whale and started out in their little motor boat to capture it. They had with them a lance bomb gun, an instrument highly recommended for whale hunting. This gun is supposed to save wear and tear on the animal by exploding a charge inside it and thereupon rendering it more or less hors de combat.

Starts for Somewhere.

So the Cooper brothers went after the whale and had the good fortune to be in excellent firing position at a moment when it saw fit to come to the surface to blow the water out of its nose.

"That she blows!" yelled the Cooper brothers, who had taken a correspondence course in whale hunting, and bang! off went the lance bomb gun. The lance struck the whale squarely in the tonneau and the fishermen waited expectantly for the dull explosion which would indicate to them that their quarry was about to roll over and ask to be taken home.

No such explosion happened. The fishermen waited and waited. All in a wink the whale started for somewhere. And the Cooper brothers, having lodged their harpoon securely in the whale, found themselves accompanying it.

They tried reversing the engine in the hope that by so doing they might convey to the whale their lack of interest in any extensive sea voyage. The motion was entirely lost on their captive, who kept right on.

The Cooper brothers then tried to increase the speed of the boat so that they might overtake the whale and explain the situation, which, in a word, was this:

The line connecting the boat with the whale was taut, and the fishermen could not free themselves. As fast as their boat went the whale went faster. There was nothing to do but admire the scenery as it passed them.

Captains to the Rescue.

They had gone about a mile and a half, and were still going, when Captain White saw what was up and piped all his trusty whale hunters to their posts. In response to the call came Captain Silas Edwards, Ed White, Frank Burnett, William Bennet and Erastus Howland.

They launched a boat and headed for the whale and its regretful captors. By the time they reached the scene the whale had its mind on something other than additional whale hunters, so they were able to get up close to it. They even circled around once, looking for a soft spot for the lance they intended to toss into it.

Then steadying himself in the bow of the boat, Cap'n Edwards rose to the best of his sixty-five years of ability and stood poised with a long lance in his hand ready to end everything.

Just at this moment, however, the whale came out of its reverie and smacked the bow of the boat a gentle tap with its tail. Cap'n Edwards being in the bow of the boat he was next seen struggling in the water and yelling for some one to take him out.

The Cooper brothers made use of the momentary respite to loosen their harpoon line. And the whale went on its way. The whalers then devoted their attention to rescuing Cap'n Edwards, and to expressing in broad terms their desire for vengeance.

CHECK DOGS; IGNORE BABES

Berlin Theaters Provide Accommodations for Patrons' Pets But Not for Children.

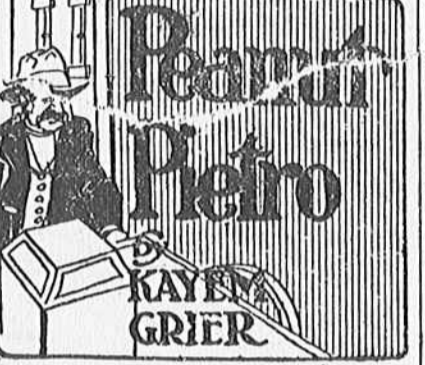

Berlin.—Pet dogs have become so popular among the feminine population of Berlin that theater managers have been compelled to install rooms where the dogs may be checked. Some patrons complain that none of the theaters has made similar provision for checking babies, and think this is an unwarranted discrimination.

During the intermissions the women repair to the "dog room" and feed the animals with bits of sandwiches which has become the custom for theatergoers to eat between the acts.

Katherine Spencer

One new film star who is rapidly coming to the fore is Katherine Spencer. Miss Spencer is a New York girl. Her father, Alvin W. Spencer, formerly of Cincinnati, O., at one time was United States consul to the West Indies. Katherine enjoys the distinction also of being the niece of John Robinson, the circus man.

How It Started

THE JURY.

SHORTLY after the Norman Conquest the Curia Regis, or King's court, appointed twelve knights to inquire into and examine various matters which might come before it. Sultors at the Curia Regis began to summon these twelve to inquire into and judge their suits. Thus, originally, the jury (Latin, jurare, to swear) were twelve men sworn to investigate and judge evidence. During the reign of Henry IV the jury was restricted to its present function as judge of facts only.
