fort: "Some work in theoretical English is included in nearly all the courses of study, but the teachers have lost faith in it. and few of them teach it con amore. For most of the pupils the limit of attainments would be as follows: They can distinguish the kind of sentences and analyze complex ones, if the relations are not very obscure; they can distinguish the parts of has ordinarily used, and describe these so far as to tell the number and case of nouns and pronouns, the tense of verbs, and the degree of adjectives. They are shaky on participles and infinities. They can explain a simple case of agreement between a verb and subject, and the use of the nominatives as subject and the objective after the preposition and as direct object of the verb. In a few schools the pupils can go beyond this. The pupils have little power to use their knowledge of grainmar to determine whether sentences are correct or not, depending for this chiefly on sound, and as experiment shows, being as likely to judge wrong as right, except in the case of very obvious errors. Few of the schools give time enough to this part of the work to secure the necessary training. Whether the training itself is worth what it would cost to get it, is another question. It is also a question whether it is best to teach grammar at all, unless it is carried far enough to obtain this do better. practical end."

In other words, is the game worth the powder? This is exactly what we have been asking. Mr. Martin has answered the question in Good English, and we thank him for doing so. The above article was taken from the Teachers' institute, a most excellent educational journal.

h language is capable of analysis, then certainly technical grammar is not entirely out of place. If it cannot be analyzed, then it is no language. It is true there is great freedom allowed in many constructions; it is true some authors may condemn what others would approve, but at the same time there must be some general principle which should be observed in our language as well as in any other. Itshould be remembered, however, that grammar is only for the most advanced pupils, and not for those in the primary or intermediate grades.

The Teachers' Association was to have met on Saturday, Feb. 17, but the bad weather prevented the teachers coming to town. It has been thought best to hold the next meeting on 1st Saturday in March. The same programme will hold for the next meeting with a paper on Grammar additional. It is to be hoped that every teacher will appear at the Academy on the 2nd of next month. The trustees of the greater part of the school districts have thought in that line will find his goods fresh that these maps will be of great value in teaching the pupils the geography of both State and county. They are right in the conclusion they have come to. It is now left to the teachers to use the means placed at their disposal. They can make rapid progress in the teaching of geography if they only will exert themselves. It is expected that as the School Commissioner visits the school when these maps have been introduced that he shall find the papils well up with the geography of this State and county.

As we visit the schools of the county we find that the attendance is very good. We observe that the children seem ansious to learn, and that they are making satisfactory progress. The teachers, in most instances, are enthusiastic in their work and seem to be doing all they can for the pupils in short term is a serious hindrance.
