DOMES OF WASHINGTON.

Exquisite Beauty of the One on the Library of Congress.

Washington possesses an unusual number of domed buildings. The student or lover of architecture finds here not only a great many but a great variety of domes. It is extraordinary that examples of all the domes of the favorite schools of architecture are grouped within the limits of this city. And such examples as they are! One of them alone would be sufficient domical adornment for even the nation's capital. Needless to say, the capitol dome is Washington's dome par excellence. Its size alone gives it pre-eminence, and its beauty ranks it among the great domes of the world. The framework of this dome is of iron and weighs nearly 9,000,000 pounds.

The keynote of its impressiveness is its massiveness. Its curving sides, encircling rows of columns, vari-shaped windows and graceful segmental ornamentations will always be only adjuncts to its impressive feature—its size. In height the capitol dome reaches 287 feet into the air; its greatest diameter is 135 feet.

Washington's most beautiful dome surmounts the library of congress. This has a diameter of 100 feet, making it almost as large as that of the capitol, but offhand one would certainly say that it is a much smaller dome. This is due to its shape. The library dome is an Italian renaissance type and is a flattened spherical vault. It is built of stucco applied to a framework of iron and steel, filled in with terra cotta. The domed roof is sheathed with copper, and over this is laid the coating of gold leaf, twenty-three carats fine.

As far as ornamentation goes, this dome is the most exquisite in the United States. The interior walls are superbly painted and adorned with arabesques.

The National museum possesses a dome neither huge nor extremely ornate, yet it is one of the most pleasing domes to the architectural eye that is found in the city. It recalls the dome on the Pantheon at Rome. In the matter of contour they are quite similar.

This dome surmounts the hall which connects the three main divisions of the museum exhibit—the geological, ethnological and zoological. It is constructed of tile, covered on the exterior with a fine quality of slate. Each row of this slate, from the outer edge of the dome to the eye at the top had to be exactly cut to fit the spaces.

At the same time the museum was being built, the astronomers at the observatory were called in consultation with the architects to calculate the measurements for the different pieces, as very intricate mathematical computations were necessary.—Washington Star.
