Signing the Armistice.

The following extract from an article by Raymond Recouly in the May number of Scribner's magazine.

They arrived in the dark of night and took their places in the same carriage as at first. Then the marshal came in. Every one sat down. Foch then read the final conditions of the armistice. The whole of the document was gone through with its two schedules. The reading took a long time. Then it was again discussed. The Germans asked for a certain number of alterations. Foch granted some, but refused the others. All this went on until a quarter past five. Foch asked the Germans to sign on a blank page before the final clause agreed to should be typed. They consented. It was decided that, the signatures having been exchanged at five in the morning, it would be six hours later, namely, at eleven o'clock, that operations should cease all along the front.

Two penholders were used for the appending of the signatures: one for the French and English, another for the Germans. The marshal kept the first one for himself, and offered the other one to Mr. Clemenceau. It was half past five when this memorable sitting was over.

Foch returned to his private compartment and rested a few moments in his armchair, then returned to the bureau carriage. In the meantime the secretaries had finished copying out the whole of the document. It was handed him in exchange for a signed receipt. At twelve the German train left Rethonde. The French one without the marshal, who had already left started at a quarter past twelve.

Whilst stopping a few minutes on the bridge near Compiègne, Foch's officers saw in the distance, near Tergnier, the fast receding train bearing the German plenipotentiaries. Weygrand, motoring to Versailles, left the train at Compiègne.

Sunday School Convention at Olanta.

(Communicated)

Today there are two things that need emphasizing in our religious life. First, we need to learn that the child is the most important factor in religious education and in evangelism. It is the religious nurture and development of the lives of children that makes possible the growth of the church and the extension of God's kingdom on earth. It cannot be done by ministering only to adult life.

Secondly, we need to get on the mind and hearts of every one that the Sunday school is the one best agency to nurture and develop the child life. It is the teaching and the training agency of the church, and it should be organized to meet the needs of the growing developing life. It touches life in its infancy and continues to minister to it during the whole of the life of the individual It is the only organization that provides a complete life program. That it is the forerunner of the church in mission fields as well as all other religious activity is shown clearly when we find that eighty-five per cent. of the members received into the church on profession of faith come through the Sunday school. Ninety-five per cent of the persons entering the ministry or other Christian work come as a result of the work of the Sunday school. About seventy per cent of the churches formed are results of Sunday school work.

Since the Sunday school is proven to be such a vital factor in our moral and religious life it becomes our Christian duty to see that the Sunday school work has an efficient organization, so that it can accomplish what it is intended to accomplish. Let every Methodist Sunday school take due notice and have its full representation of real interested Sunday school
