The man's levity jarred upon Dun-bar's sensitive nature. Brought up to the atmosphere of a New England bome, be felt that, if ever there was a time in his life when he needed the interposition of a Divine influence, it was now, and the Frenchman's words were not pleasant to his car; but he restrained the reproach that rose to his Mps, and quietly asked:

"I know it, Campignon," Dunbar said, but I have provided against such a contingency. I have left your pay secured to you in the bank at Colombo and enough to make these faithful fel-lows happy for the rest of their lives in case anything happened to me."

For a few minutes the Frenchman walked cooks silence. Suddenly he turned to Arthur and said, eagerly: "What made you tell me that? Have von po fear that-I should play you false? What is to hinder me from abandoning you in this wildorness?

Campignon's eyes glistened.

"And you have implicit confidence in mel" he said, with tremulous tone. "Then, by the Lord young man, you shall never have cause to regret it."

There is a prevalent idea that most tropical forests teem with wild fruits, which nature is supposed to produce spontaneously. Nothing can be more erroneous. It is true our adventurers sometimes found the gnava and katumbille, which served to slack their burning thirst, the blackberries and the acid gooseberries, and very rarely the attachment towards him, and now approached him and gently licked his sweet "morra" which grows in grapelike clusters, but none of these were "Good old fellow!" Arthur said, taking the animal's head between his hands

In vain they cried aloud till the woods reechoed their voices; in vain they fired off their rifles and waited a response. The Frenchman was gone from their midst, and, what was worse, he had taken their best rifle and their dog with him.

"Oh, the false-hearted traftor! to leave me like this for a few paltry. pieces of gold!" Dunbar groaned, when the natives who had scoured the woods returned after a vain search. He could not communicate to them his suspicions. He could only sit upon the to be failing him; be forgot where he was; the trees assumed fantastic shapes; the rocks seemed to be perpetually wheeling round, and his head was heavy as lead.
