While being taken to the court, the officer noticed a piece of cloth projecting from under his vest. Upon examination it was found that Johnson had stolen one of the guardbouse blankets and wrapped it around his body, covering it with his vest and coat. The cutting was done with a razor, and took place near the A. C. L. depot. Cosiderable groes ran for doctors. THREE TRUNKS AND A CON-STABLE.

Suspected of Containing Liquor, they are Guarded All Day by Constable Brown.

There was a whiskey drummer in town last week and the Constables were informed on good authority that he took orders from three parties, who are suspected of selling contraband liquor. Since then the Constables have been keeping a sharp lookout for the liquor. They knew that it would have to be shipped in some unusual way and they have been puzzling their wits to imagine how it would come. Wednesday three large trunks came in on the Florence train, and for some reason Constable George Just Brown suspected that they contained whiskey. The trunks were large, heavy and unmarked. No one knew to whom they belonged, and no one claimed them. Therefore the Constable stood guard over the trunks all day waiting for some one to come after them, when he intended to follow them and see the trunks opened. But no one came for the trunks during the day, and the Coustable's weary watch was fruitless.

When the evening train from Columbia came in a stranger, persumably a drummer, made his appearance, claimed the trunks and had them re-checked for Manning. Whether these trucks contained whiskey or bardware is a sealed question, but it is believed by some that the trunks did contain liquor, and that it was intended for parties in Sumter, An old-time negro in Concord township, is but that the close watch maintained by the police and Constante Brown prevented a delivery. Perhaps, and perhaps not.
