Those who sat at the prinicapt table with Lord Desborough, Chief Justice Taft and Amabssador Harvey, included the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earl of Balfour, the Earl of Debery, the Earl of Devonshire, Viscount Cave, Lord Lee of Fareham, Lord Corson, Lord James M. Beck, solicitor general of the United States.

The other guests included Viscount Astor, the American congeneral; Robert P. Skinner and the staff of the American embassy.

Mr. Taft apologized for avoidance of certain subjects, the discussion of which might have been possible were he as simple private citizen but was precluded beause, as he declared it, "the monastic order I have joined and the vows I have taken prevent such discussion." He proceeded briefly to review the history of the relations between Great Britain and America, th course of which he said: "No trouble arises between the two countries that we of America do not all of us look forward to its settlement either by negotiation or by arbitration. Any other event is not considered for a moment. This American state of mind is a constant factor in our relations; it sometimes produces an apparent indifference or lack of excitement on the part of our people over irritating issues that is misleading
